In not a few of these churches "a man-made ministry"—as that is commonly termed, which has not disdained, in the arrogance of spiritual conceit, to bring the aid of human learning to the exposition of divine truth—is held in utter contempt; doctrinal views bordering upon the extremes of Calvinism, and held in pernicious isolation from the heart-stirring principles of Christian duty, maintain a dominant ascendancy; and the cramped and bigoted spirit which those views, when thus held, are fitted to cherish, influences but too powerfully the relations which subsist between the Christian church and the world of ungodliness lying around.

A New Roman Catholic Prayer.—The following article, which we copy from a recent number of the N. Y. Daily Tribune, will show our readers how the Roman Catholic Church gets its praying done, and how those who pray get paid for it:—

The authorities of the Roman Catholic Church have just issued the following, designed to organize a "Prayer Association for the conversion of all who are out of the communion of the Church in the United States:"

By a Rescript, dated Sept. 5, 1853, our Holy Father, Pius IX., at the instance of the National Council of Baltimore, sanctions, by the grant of Indulgences, the institution of a Society whose members shall especially pray for the conversion of all who are out of the communion of the Church in the United States.

Almighty and Eternal God, who savest all, and wilt have none to perish, have regard to those souls who are led astray by the deceits of the devil, that, rejecting all errors, the hearts of those who err may be converted, and may return to the unity of Thy truth, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Those who cannot recite the above prayer, may obtain the same Indulgence by saying daily in its stead the Our Father, Hail Mary, and Glory be to the Father, three times, with the same intention.

1. A Plenary Indulgence on receiving the Easter communion to all the members who shall daily recite, in any language, the above prayer.

2. A Plenary Indulgence in the hour of death, on condition of receiving the Holy Eucharist, after confessing their sins with sorrow; or, if they cannot receive it, on their invoking the name of Jesus with their lips, or at least in their hearts.

3. An Indulgence of a hundred days every time the members recite the above prayer.

The President's Message we give entire, because we suppose that all of our readers will be interested in this first formal statement of his views upon national questions.

Religious Changes in Ireland.—In a recent number of the Dublin Nation appeared a long article on this topic, in which the editor says:

"The Irish nation is fast dissolving, as the Jewish nation dissolved before the curse of God—as the Carthaginian nation dissolved before the sword of Rome—as the Red Indian race silently dissolves before the face of the white man. Ireland is ceasing to be a Roman Catholic nation. Priest Fitzgerald, in a recent speech, admits, 'Our nation and our church are perishing.' An organ of Romanism says 'Shall the soupers and tract distributors accomplish the work which all the force of England for three hundred years has been unable to effect?'"

Again:—

"We are afraid that neither the priesthood nor the people of this country have any idea of the system of proselytism carried on under their eyes. Its agents and emissaries—from the wealthy fanatics of Exeter Hall down to the meanest Bible reader in Connaught—are continually at work, and God only knows the evil they have wrought. It is time, and God knows there is full cause, to preach a crusade against it. It has had an incalculable success."

Baptists in New York.—Rev. H. J. Eddy, in an appeal for Home Missions, which he communicates to the New York Recorder, gives some startling figures of denominational decline in the "Empire State" within the last ten years. He says:—

"Mark this fact: During the last nine years, our numbers have decreased ten thousand and sixty-four. But the population of the State has rapidly increased. In ten years the population of New York city has nearly doubled. You had twenty-one churches then, and only thirty-one now. But what is still more appalling, you had eight thousand and thirteen communicants then, and you have only eight thousand three hundred and fifty-one now. Your increase for ten years is only 351, but the population of the city has increased 300,000."

Farewell Missionary Meeting.—On Sunday evening, Dec. 4, a meeting was held in New York on the occasion of the departure of several Missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union. A large congregation assembled, who were addressed by Rev. Dr. Bright, Rev. Mr. Lathrop, and Rev. Mr. Dean. The Missionaries are about to depart for stations in Asia, viz: For China, the Rev. E. C. Lord, (returning,) and the Rev. M. J. Knowlton; for Siam, the Rev. R. Telford and Mr. J. H. Chandler; and for Burmah, the Rev. J. S. Douglass. It is said that all these Missionaries are married gentlemen, and will be accompanied by their wives.

The Methodist Church Case.—The long-pending case between the Northern and Southern divisions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has been decided. The Southern division is to have the sum of $191,000, in cash, together with the Richmond, Charleston, and Nashville printing establishments, and all the debts on books and periodicals, due the New York Book Concern, from individuals residing within the geographical limits of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Pious Parentage of Students.—A student in the theological seminary at Princeton, says that of one hundred and twenty students at present in that institution, ninety-five have parents of whom both are pious, eighteen have pious mothers only, one a pious father only, and five have neither a pious father nor mother. Of the whole number, twenty-two, or about one-fifth, are the sons of ministers, and a large number of the rest are the sons of the elders of the church.

Great Fire in New York.—At one o'clock in the afternoon of last Sabbath, (Saturday,) a fire was discovered in one of the buildings occupied by the publishing establishment of the Messrs. Harpers, near Franklin Square, New York. It is supposed to have originated from the explosion of some camphene fluid, and it spread with such astonishing rapidity that many of the people at work in the establishment escaped with difficulty, after receiving more or less injury. The fire raged most of the afternoon, destroying sixteen buildings, and property to the amount of $1,560,500, and throwing out of employment nearly two thousand working people. The heaviest loss will fall on the Messrs. Harpers, and is estimated at $1,400,000, their insurance amounting to only $200,000. The Messrs. Cooledge, publishers, also lost about $100,000, which is nearly covered by insurance. Many other persons in the immediate vicinity sustained damage, but they are mostly covered by insurance.

European News.

We have European news to Nov. 26th, a summary of which will be found below.

The news by the last steamer is of a more satisfactory character than any yet received, relative to affairs between Turkey and Russia. Hostilities all along the Moldavia Wallachian lines have ceased in consequence of the overflow of the Danube. The Czar, in answer to an inquiry of Austria, says he will propose a project of peace, and the Sultan is said to be equally disposed to come to terms, but will not be the first to retract. It is said the Sultan has sent Faud Effendi as Imperial Commisioner to the army on the Danube to restrain the ardor of Omar Pasha, and thus gives another chance for a treaty of peace. The French Minister at London returned to Paris with a draft of a treaty of peace agreed to by France and England, and in which the other powers of Europe will be invited to join. The success of the Turkish army in Asia still continued. In fact, the Turks appear to be victorious in all their operations.

A letter from St. Petersburg says that the Emperor of Russia is suffering from illness.

The coronation of Napoleon is fixed for the 20th Jan.

The cholera has made is appearance in Paris. There were about nine cases a day.

Donna Maria II., Queen of Portugal, died on the 15th ult., at noon, in childbed. The King was immediately declared Regent until the majority of the Prince, according to the laws of the kingdom. The oldest son and successor of the late Queen is in his seventeenth year.

Shanghae remained in the possession of the insurgents; some fighting occurred at Amoy. Canton remained quiet.

In Burmah, it is said, another war was imminent.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 5.

In the House, nothing was done beyond reëlecting all the officers of the last House and adopting all its rules without exception.

In the Senate, Mr. Dodge gave notice of a bill to give land to Iowa railroads, and of another establishing a Territorial Government in Nebraska. Mr. Gwin gave notice of a bill to give lands in California for the Pacific Railroad; of another to establish a line of mail steamers from San Francisco by way of the Sandwich Islands, to Shanghae; and of another to pay California for the expenses she has had to bear in suppressing Indian hostilities. Mr. Seward introduced a resolution calling for correspondence with the King of the Sandwich Islands. A resolution by Mr. Fish for an inquiry into the recent mortality on board emigrant ships, with a view to such legislation as may be necessary in the premises, was postponed.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 6.

There was very little done in either House, except to hear the President's Message, and order the printing of the usual number of copies. In the Senate, notice was given of several bills to be introduced; and in the House it was voted to elect two Chaplains for the entire Congress.

FOURTH-DAY, DEC. 7.

In the Senate, the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury was received, and referred to the Committee on Finance; after which the Rev. Henry Slicer (Methodist) was elected Chaplain. Mr. Gwin introduced several bills having reference to improvements, &c., in California. Mr. Fish's resolution, introduced on the first day of the session, for the appointment of a special Committee to inquire into the causes of mortality on board emigrant vessels from European ports, was adopted. The bill from the House for the relief of the late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, was passed. Messrs. Slidell and Benjamin gave notice of bills granting lands to Louisiana to aid in the construction of railroads.

The House having been called to order, and the journal read, proceeded to the election of a Public Printer, which resulted in the choice of Gen. Armstrong, of The Union. Mr. Walbridge presented a memorial of Merchants of New York, asking increased mail facilities between the United States and the Spanish Main. The Secretary of the Treasury's Report was submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means. The House then proceeded to elect a Chaplain, which resulted in the choice of William H. Milburn, of the Methodist Church South.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 8.

In the Senate, Mr. Hunter, of Va., announced the death of Vice President William R. King, in an eloquent eulogy on his life and public services. Messrs. Clayton, Cass, Everett and Douglas, followed in beautiful and impressive addresses, after which the usual resolutions were adopted, and the Senate adjourned until Second-day.

In the House, after the reading of the journal, a message was received from the Senate, announcing the proceedings in that body upon the death of the late Vice-President, when Mr. Harris, of Alabama, delivered a glowing eulogium upon the deceased. Other members followed, and after adopting appropriate resolutions, the House adjourned until Second-day.

SUMMARY.

On Thursday evening, Dec. 8, an Erie Railroad emigrant train going out, and an express train coming in were driven into each other at a curve about three miles from Jersey City. The engineers seeing the imminence of the crash, jumped off in season and escaped unhurt, but the conductor of the express train was somewhat injured, a brakeman had his ancle cut off and has since died; two of the passengers were so injured that their recovery is doubtful, and two other persons were hurt, but not dangerously. The loss of life is thus, at the worst, limited to three persons, but it is a miracle that half the number on board the two trains were not destroyed. The violence of the shock was such that the locomotives were broken and the forward cars forced into each other and crushed to pieces.

There are remaining in this City eight of the sufferers in the Dartmoor Prison. When taken they were brave, sturdy heroes, battling with the foe for the rights of home and country. Now the frosts of many winters have whitened their heads, enfeebled their frames, and paleied their vigor. They are poor and almost destitute; a grateful country does not let its heroes want, but stretches out the hand of parental protection, and affords succor to their neediness and support to their old age. A meeting was held by these poor old men the other day, when a communication was read from one of their comrades in Massachusetts, stating that efforts would be made in Congress during the present session to obtain adequate relief for all.

A statement has been made of the number of letters and newspapers assorted and distributed at the New York City Post-Office on Tuesday, Nov. 29, being the greatest day's work ever performed there. The total number of letters received or sent out during that day was 198,807; newspapers do., 207,102. Total, 405,909. The number of hands employed in the various departments is 140, an addition of 36 having been required within two or three months past by the increase of business and to supply the deficiency before existing. The above is exclusive of 70 letter-carriers and 10 persons employed in collecting letters from the different station-boxes about the City.

Sir George Gore, an English Baronet, and a party of English gentlemen from Canada, arrived at St. Louis on Tuesday last by way of the Illinois River. They have just concluded a hunting excursion in the region of Lake Michigan, and are en route for Texas, with the intention of passing the winter in that State. The party have a perfect sporting outfit; tents, guns, ammunition, dog keepers and twenty-three thorough-bred English hunting hounds. They have servants also, and some dozens of trunks and carpet-sacks of baggage.

John Schultz, charged with the murder of two planters in Texas, ten years ago, has recently been arrested in South Carolina, and is now in New Orleans, on his way to Texas, to answer for the offense. He was their overseer; they were traveling in company—had camped out—when they were asleep, he cut the throat of one, and shot the other. He obtained a large sum of money by the murder—spent it all in gambling, was afterward tried for a successful burglary, was sent to the Penitentiary, from which he was released by pardon. He was traced to South Carolina, and is now to be tried for the double murder.

A report has been published of a Russian Expedition to Japan. It seems that Capt. Lindenberg, of the ship Prince Menchikoff, was sent to one of the Japanese Islands in the year 1852, not only to interchange civilities with the local authorities, but to restore to their country a number of shipwrecked Japenese who had found their way to Russian American Company's Colony of Sitka. The Captain states that he was politely received, but jealously watched by the Japenese officials, and not allowed to land the poor fellows he had brought with him.

In an article on coal, a few days since, (says the Newark Daily Advertiser,) we stated that an arrangement had been made for connecting the Central Railroad of New Jersey with a Pennsylvania coal road. Another feature of this arrangement appears in an application to the Legislature for a branch from the Central Railroad at Boundbrook to Perth Amboy, the intention of which is to make Perth Amboy the coal depot. Among other applications we see in the Elizabethtown Journal that for a new County to be formed from the six lower townships of Essex, and a bridge from Elizabethport to Bergen, across Newark Bay.

The Norwich (Ct.) Courier announces that Mr. Abner T. Pierce, of that city, has suspended payment. Mr. Pierce carried on two large car manufactories, one at Norwich, and the other at the eastern terminus of the Erie Railroad, and a foundry establishment in Norwich. Since his failure the Courier adds, it has been ascertained, "that he has been engaged in forgeries to a heavy amount—not less than ninety thousand dollars of his spurious paper having been found in the banks of this city."

The War Department has received advices from Capt. Morris, confirmatory of the previous accounts of the massacre of the Gunnison party. The Star says that Morris found the bodies so mutilated by wolves that they could not remove or even bury them. Capt. Gunnison was shot with 15 arrows, and Mr. Kearn, late draughtsman of the topographical bureau, was shot through the heart with a rifle ball, and both his arms were torn off. Nothing but a watch-guard was found on his body.

The property on Broadway and the south corner of Courtlandt-st., fifty feet front by one hundred, has been leased at $8,000 per annum for fifteen years, the lessee to put up a building costing $50,000, to revert to the owner of the ground on the expiration of the lease. A bonus of $100,000, we hear, has been offered for this lease, and refused, it being considered as really worth three or four times that sum, from the rental expected to be realized.

The New York Central Railroad Co. have assumed the expense of laying one or two miles of the improvement of Mr. Babcock, in the application of Rubber under their tracks, intended to obviate materially the present destruction of rails and machinery, and do away with the noise attendant upon the motion of the trains. It is to be laid under Ribbard's slide compound rail.

At Saltfleet, Canada, a young woman who had been courted by a mopus of a fellow for four long years to little purpose, got sick of that sort of fun, and married a more enterprising suitor who presented himself. Mopus opened his eyes and sued her for breach of promise. The jury, composed of men who had hearts beating under their jackets, returned a verdict of "served him right."

The Milwaukie Wisconsin states that a steamship is about to be built of 325 feet keel, 40 feet beam, 14 feet hold, without guards or paddle boxes, to cost $165,000. This steamer is intended as a ferry across Lake Michigan, to connect the Oakland and Ottoway and the Milwaukie and Mississippi Railroad, or Grand Haven and Milwaukie. The vessel is to be ready for sea in the autumn of 1854.

Wm. Moore was found guilty of manslaughter at Rockford, Ill., on the 28th ult., and sentenced to the Penitentiary for one year. He murdered a man named Terrence Donnerie, and the people were so indignant at the verdict of the Jury, that they held a public meeting and denounced the sentence of the Court as a burlesque and disgrace to the country.

The steamship Humboldt, on her passage from Southampton to New York, went ashore near Halifax, a few days ago, and will probably prove a total loss. Her passengers were all saved. Her cargo is estimated to be worth $400,000, most of which will be saved in a damaged condition.

The Halifax Chronicle charges the loss of the steamship Humboldt to an impudent and ignorant fisherman, who boarded her in the character of a pilot, to which he had no claim, and when asked to show his papers said he had left them at home.

The people at Erie, Pa., are making a great disturbance because one of the railroads running into the place proposes to change its guage. Now it is necessary to change cars and baggage at Erie; when the guage is altered it will not be; hence their interest in keeping things as they are.

A dispatch dated Herkimer, Friday, Dec. 9, 1853, says: As a man was crossing the track to-day in a double wagon, the freight train going West came up, smashed the wagon to pieces, killed one of the horses, and carried the man about 100 rods on the cow-catcher, without doing him any material injury.

The President's Message,

its high promise of great and general usefulness.

I have omitted to ask your favorable consideration for the estimates of works of a local character in twenty-seven of the thirty-one States, amounting to one million seven hundred and fifty-four thousand five hundred dollars, because, independently of the grounds which have so often been urged against the application of the Federal Revenue for works of this character, inequality with consequent injustice is inherent in the nature of the proposition, and because the plan has proved entirely inadequate to the accomplishment of the objects sought.

The subject of internal improvements, claiming alike the interest and good will of all, has, nevertheless been the basis of much political discussion, and has stood as a deep graven line of division between statesmen of eminent ability and patriotism. The rule of strict construction of all powers delegated by the States to the General Government has arrayed itself, from time, to time against the rapid progress of expenditures from the National Treasury on works of a local character within the States. Memorable as an epoch in the history of this subject is the Message of President Jackson, of the 27th of May, 1830, which met the system of internal improvements in its comparative infancy; but so rapid had been its growth, that the projected appropriations in that year for works of this character had risen to the alarming amount of more than one hundred millions of dollars.

In that message the President admitted the difficulty of bringing back the operations of the Government to the construction of the Constitution set up in 1798, and marked it as an admonitory proof of the necessity of guarding that instrument with sleepless vigilance, against the authority of precedents, which had not the sanction of its most plainly defined powers.

Our Government exists under a written compact between sovereign States, uniting for specific objects, and with specific grants to their general agent. If, then, in the progress of its administration, there have been departures from the terms and intent of the compact, it is, and will ever be, proper to refer back to the fixed standard which our fathers left us, and to make a stern effort to conform our action to it. It would seem that the fact of a principle having been resisted from the first by many of the wisest and most patriotic men of the Republic, and a policy having provoked constant strife, without arriving at a conclusion which can be regarded as satisfactory to its most earnest advocates, should suggest the inquiry whether there may not be a plan likely to be crowned by happier results. Without perceiving any sound distinction, or intending to assert any principle as opposed to improvements needed for the protection of internal commerce, which does not equally apply to improvements upon the seaboard for the protection of foreign commerce, I submit to you, whether it may not be safely anticipated that, if the policy were once settled against appropriations by the General Government for local improvements for the benefit of commerce, localities requiring expenditures would not, by modes and means clearly legitimate and proper, raise the fund necessary for such construction as the safety or other interests of their commerce might require.

If that can be regarded as a system, which, in the experience of more than thirty years, has at no time so commanded the public judgment as to give it the character of a settled policy—which, though it has produced some works of conceded importance, has been attended with an expenditure quite disproportionate to their value—and has resulted in squandering large sums upon objects which have answered no valuable purpose—the interests of all the States require it to be abandoned, unless hopes may be indulged for the future which find no warrant in the past.

With an anxious desire for the completion of the works which are regarded by all good citizens with sincere interest, I have deemed it my duty to ask at your hands a deliberate reconsideration of the question, with a hope that, animated by a desire to promote the permanent and substantial interests of the country, your wisdom may prove equal to the task of devising and maturing a plan, which, applied to this subject, may promise something better than constant strife, the suspension of the powers of local enterprise, the exciting of vain hopes, and the disappointment of cherished expectations.

In expending the appropriations made by the last Congress, several cases have arisen in relation to works for the improvement of harbors, which involve a question as to the right of soil and jurisdiction, and have threatened conflict between the authority of the State and General Government. The right to construct a breakwater, jetty, or dam, would seem, necessarily, to carry with it the power to protect and preserve such constructions. This can only be effectually done by having jurisdiction over the soil. But no clause of the Constitution is found, on which to rest the claim of the United States to exercise jurisdiction over the soil of a State, except that conferred by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. It is, then, submitted, whether, in all cases where constructions are to be erected by the General Government, the right of soil should not first be obtained, and legislative provision be made to cover all such cases.

For the progress made in the construction of roads within the territories, as provided for in the appropriations of the last Congress, I refer you to the Report of the Secretary of War.

There is one subject of a domestic nature, which, from its intrinsic importance, and the many interesting questions of future policy which it involves, cannot fail to receive your early attention. I allude to the means of communication, by which different parts of wide expanse of our country are to be placed in closer connection for the purposes both of defense and commercial intercourse, and more especially such as appertain to the communication of those great divisions of the Union, which lie on the opposite sides of the Rocky Mountains.

That the Government has not been unmindful of this heretofore, is apparent from the aid it has afforded, through appropriations for mail facilities and other purposes. But the general subject will now present itself under aspects more imposing and more purely national, by reason of the surveys ordered by Congress, and now in the process of completion, for communication by railway across the Continent, and wholly within the limits of the United States.

The power to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and to call forth the militia to execute the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, was conferred upon Congress, as means to provide for the common defense, and to protect a territory and a population now wide-spread and vastly multiplied. As incidental to and indispensable for the exercise of this power, it must sometimes be necessary to construct military roads and protect harbors of refuge. To appropriations by Congress for such objects, no sound objection can be raised. Happily for our country, its peaceful policy and rapidly increasing population impose upon us no urgent necessity for preparation, and leave but few trackless deserts between assailable points and a patriotic people ever ready and generally able to protect them. These necessary links the enterprise and energy of our people are steadily and boldly struggling to supply. All experience affirms that wherever private enterprise will avail, it is most wise for the General Government to leave to that and individual watchfulness the location and execution of all means of communication.

The surveys before alluded to were designed to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a Railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean. Parties are now in the field making explorations, where previous examinations had not supplied sufficient data, and where there was the best reason to hope the object sought might be found. The means and time being both limited, it is not to be expected that all the accurate knowledge desired will now be obtained; but it is hoped that much and important information will be added to the stock previously possessed, and that partial, if not full reports of the surveys ordered, will be received in time for transmission to the two Houses of Congress, on or before the first Monday in February next, as required by the act of appropriation. The magnitude of the enterprise contemplated has aroused, and will doubtless continue to excite a very general interest throughout the country. In its political, its commercial, and its military bearings, it has varied, great, and increasing claims to consideration. The heavy expense, the great delay, and, at times, fatality attending travel by either of the Isthmus routes, have demonstrated the advantage, which would result from interoceanic communication by such safe and rapid means as a railroad would supply.

These difficulties, which have been encountered in a period of peace, would be magnified and still further increased in time of war. But while the embarrassments already encountered, and others under new contingencies to be anticipated, may serve strikingly to exhibit the importance of such a work, neither these, nor all considerations combined, can have an appreciable value, when weighed against the obligation strictly to adhere to the Constitution, and faithfully to execute the power it confers. Within this limit and to the extent of the interest of the government involved, it would seem both expedient and proper, if an economical and practicable route shall be found, to aid, by all constitutional means, in the construction of a road, which will unite, by speedy transit, the populations of the Pacific and Atlantic States. To guard against misconception, it should be remarked that, although the power to construct, or aid in the construction of a road within the limits of a territory is not embarrassed by that question of jurisdiction which would arise within the limits of a State, it is nevertheless held to be of doubtful power, and more than doubtful propriety, even within the limits of a territory, for the general government to undertake to administer the affairs of a railroad, a canal, or other similar construction, and therefore that its connection with a work of this character should be incidental rather than primary. I will only add, at present, that, fully appreciating the magnitude of the subject, and solicitous that the Atlantic and Pacific shores of the Republic may be bound together by inseparable ties of common interest, as well as of common fealty and attachment to the Union, I shall be disposed, so far as my action is concerned, to follow the lights of the Constitution, as expounded and illustrated by those whose opinions and expositions constitute the standard of my political faith in regard to the powers of the government. It is, I trust, not necessary to say, that no grandeur of enterprise, and no present urgent inducement promising popular favor, will lead me to disregard those lights, or to depart from that path, which experience has proved to be safe, and which is now radiant with the glow of prosperity and legitimate constitutional progress. We can afford to wait, but we cannot afford to overlook the ark of our security.

It is no part of my purpose to give prominence to any subject, which may properly be regarded as set at rest by the deliberate judgment of the people. But while the present is bright with promise, and the future full of demand and inducement for the exercise of active intelligence, the past can never be without useful lessons of admonition and instruction. If its dangers serve not as beacons, they will evidently fail to fulfill the object of a wise design. When the grave shall have closed over all, who are now endeavoring to meet the obligations of duty, the year 1850 will be recurred to as a period filled with anxious apprehension. A successful war had just terminated. Peace brought with it a vast augmentation of territory. Disturbing questions arose, bearing upon the domestic institutions of one portion of the confederacy, and involving the constitutional rights of the States. But, notwithstanding differences of opinion and sentiment, which then existed in relation to details and specific provisions, the acquiescence of distinguished citizens, whose devotion to the Union can never be doubted, has given renewed vigor to our institutions, and restored a sense of repose and security to the public mind throughout the confederacy. That this repose is to suffer no shock during my official term, if I have power to avert it, those who placed me here may be assured. The wisdom of men who knew what independence cost—who had put all at stake upon the issue of the Revolutionary struggle—disposed of the subject to which I refer, in the only way consistent with the union of these States, and with the march of power and prosperity which has made us what we are. It is a significant fact, that from the adoption of the Constitution until the officers and soldiers of the Revolution had passed to their graves, or, through the infirmities of age and wounds, had ceased to participate actively in public affairs, there was not merely a quiet acquiescence in, but a prompt vindication of the constitutional rights of the States. The reserved powers were scrupulously respected. No statesman put forth the narrow views of casuists to justify interference and agitation, but the spirit of the compact was regarded as sacred in the eye of honor, and indispensable for the great experiment of civil liberty, which, environed with inherent difficulties, was yet borne forward in apparent weakness by a power superior to all obstacles. There is no condemnation which the voice of Freedom will not pronounce upon us, should we prove faithless to this great trust. While men inhabiting different parts of this great continent can no more be expected to hold the same opinions, or entertain the same sentiments, than every variety of climate or soil can be expected to furnish the same agricultural products, they can unite in a common object and sustain common principles essential to the maintenance of that object. The gallant men of the South and the North could stand together during the struggle of the Revolution; they could stand together in the more trying period which succeeded the clangor of arms. As their united valor was adequate to all the trials of the camp and dangers of the field, so their united wisdom proved equal to the greater task of founding, upon a deep and broad basis, institutions, which it has been our privilege to enjoy, and will ever be our most sacred duty to sustain. It is but the feeble expression of a faith strong and universal, to say that their sons, whose blood mingled so often upon the same field, during the war of 1812, and who have more recently borne in triumph the flag of the country upon a foreign soil, will never permit alienation of feeling to weaken the power of their united efforts, nor internal dissentions to paralyze the great arm of freedom, uplifted for the vindication of self-government.

I have thus briefly presented such suggestions as seem to me especially worthy of your consideration. In providing for the present, you can hardly fail to avail yourselves of the light, which the experience of the past casts upon the future.

The growth of our population has now brought us, in the destined career of our national history, to a point at which it well behooves us to expand our vision over the vast perspective.

The successive decennial returns of the census since the adoption of the Constitution have revealed a law of steady progressive development, which may be stated, in general terms, as a duplication every quarter-century. Carried forward, from the point already reached, for only a short period of time as applicable to the existence of a nation, this law of progress, if unchecked, will bring us to almost incredible results. A large allowance for a diminished proportional effect of emigration would not very materially reduce the estimate, while the increased average duration of human life, known to have already resulted from the scientific and hygienc improvements of the past fifty years, will tend to keep up through the next fifty, or perhaps hundred, the same ratio of growth which has been thus revealed in our past progress; and to the influence of these causes may be added the influx of laboring masses from eastern Asia to the Pacific side of our possessions, together with the probable accession of the populations already existing in other parts of our hemisphere, which, within the period in question, will feel, with yearly increasing force, the natural attraction of so vast, powerful, and prosperous a confederation of self-governing republics, and seek the privilege of being admitted within its safe and happy bosom, transferring with themselves, by a peaceful and healthy process of incorporation, spacious regions of virgin and exuberant soil, which are destined to swarm with the fast-growing and fast-spreading millions of our race.

These considerations seem fully to justify the presumption, that the law of population above stated, will continue to act with undiminished effect, through at least the next half century; and that thousands of persons who have already arrived at maturity, and are now exercising the rights of freemen, will close their eyes on the spectacle of more than one hundred millions of population embraced within the majestic proportions of the American Union. It is not merely as an interesting topic of speculation that I present these views for your consideration. They have important practical bearings upon all the political duties we are called upon to perform. Heretofore, our system of government has worked on what may be termed a miniature scale, in comparison with the development, which it must thus assume, within a future so near at hand as scarcely to be beyond the present of the existing generation.

It is evident that a confederation so vast and so varied, both in numbers and in territorial extent, in habits and in interests, could only be kept in national cohesion by the strictest fidelity to the principles of the Constitution, as understood by those who have adhered to the most restricted construction of the powers granted by the people and the States. Interpreted and applied according to those principles, the great compact adapts itself with healthy ease and freedom to an unlimited extension of that benign system of federative self-government, of which it is our glorious, and, I trust, immortal charter. Let us, then, with redoubled vigilance, be on our guard against yielding to the temptation of the exercise of doubtful powers, even under the pressure of the motives of conceded temporary advantage and apparent temporary expediency.

The minimum of Federal Government, compatible with the maintenance of national unity and efficient action in our relations with the rest of the world, should afford the rule and measure of construction of our powers under the general clauses of the Constitution. A spirit of strict deference to the sovereign rights and dignity of every State, rather than a disposition to subordinate the States into a provincial relation to the central authority, should characterize all our exercise of the respective powers temporarily vested in us as a sacred trust from the generous confidence of our constituents.

In like manner, as a manifestly indispensable condition of the perpetuation of Union, and of the realization of that magnificent national future adverted to, does the duty become yearly stronger and clearer upon us, as citizens of the several States, to cultivate a fraternal and affectionate spirit, language, and conduct, in regard to other States, and in relation to the varied interests, institutions, and habits of sentiment and opinion, which may respectively characterize them. Mutual forbearance, respect, and non-interference in our personal action as citizens, and an enlarged exercise of the most liberal principles of comity in the public dealing of State with State, whether in legislation or in the execution of laws, are the means to perpetuate that confidence and fraternity, the decay of which a mere political union, on so vast a scale, could not long survive.

In still another point of view, is an important practical duty suggested by this consideration of the magnitude of dimensions, to which our political system, with its corresponding machinery of government, is so rapidly expanding. With increased vigilance does it require us to cultivate the cardinal virtues of public frugality and official integrity and purity. Public affairs ought to be so conducted that a settled conviction shall pervade the entire Union, that nothing short of the highest tone and standard of public morality marks every part of the administration and legislation of the General Government. Thus will the federal system, whatever expansion time and progress may give it, continue more and more deeply rooted in the love and confidence of the people.

That wise economy, which is as far removed from parsimony as from corrupt and corrupting extravagance—that single regard for the public good, which will frown upon all attempts to approach the treasury with insidious projects of private interest cloaked under public pretexts—that sound fiscal administration, which, in the legislative department, guards against the dangerous temptations incident to overflowing revenue, and, in the Executive, maintains an unsleeping watchfulness against the tendency of all national expenditure to extravagance—while they are admitted elementary political duties, may, I trust, be deemed as properly adverted to and urged, in view of the more impressive sense of that necessity, which is, directly suggested by the considerations now presented.

Since the adjournment of Congress, the Vice President of the United States has passed from the scenes of earth, without having entered upon the duties of the station, to which he had been called by the voice of his countrymen. Having occupied, almost continuously, for more than thirty years, a seat in one or the other of the two houses of Congress, and having, by his singular purity and wisdom, secured unbounded confidence and universal respect, his failing health was watched by the nation with painful solicitude. His loss to the country, under all the circumstances, has been justly regarded as irreparable.

In compliance with the act of Congress of March 2, 1853, the oath of office was administered to him on the 24th of that month, at Ariadne estate, near Matanzas, in the island of Cuba; but his strength gradually declined, and was hardly sufficient to enable him to return to his home in Alabama, where, on the eighteenth day of April, in the most calm and peaceful way, his long and eminently useful career was terminated.

Entertaining unlimited confidence in your intelligent and patriotic devotion to the public interest, and being conscious of no motives on my part which are not inseparable from the honor and advancement of my country, I hope it may be my privilege to deserve and secure, not only your cordial coöperation in great public measures, but also those relations of mutual confidence and regard which it is always so desirable to cultivate between members of coördinate branches of the Government.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 5, 1853.

Railway Traveling in Russia.

We proceeded, bag and baggage, to the station of the Moscow Railway. Only one train starts daily; and the hour at which this most important event takes place is, or ought to be, eleven A. M. Travelers are commanded by the government to be at the station at ten precisely; and even then they are liable to be told that the train is full—as it is quite an unheard of thing to put on an extra carriage for any number of passengers. Having arrived, therefore, at ten minutes before ten, to be quite sure of being in time, our luggage was seized by a soldier, policeman, or railway porter, (for they all wear somewhat the same uniform,) and carried in one direction, while we rushed in another to show our passport for Moscow, to procure which we had been to three different offices the day before. Here the descriptions of our persons and our reasons for traveling, which it contained, being copied at full length, we were hurried to another counter, where we got it stamped; whence, catching sight of our baggage en passant, we sped on to the ticket-office, and then, returning to our portmanteaux, we went through a few formalities, which ended in receiving a ticket to add to the number of those with which our pockets were now pretty well filled. The anxiety of mind which such a variety of documents causes is not to be wondered at, when the consequences which the loss of any of them would entail are considered. Ladies in Russia do not think of trying to carry their tickets in their gloves. We now betook ourselves to the waiting-room, which we should have thought handsome had we not been detained in it so long that we got tired of admiring it. For an hour did the destined occupants of the train sit patiently on the benches, every man with head uncovered—for even a skull cap is an abomination to a Russian under a roof. Every man in military garb seemed to have the entree to the platform, while the doors were rigorously shut against us unhappy civilians. At a quarter before eleven, however, they are opened—a general rush follows, and we are hurried through a barrier, the doors of which close behind us. Soon the whole barrier becomes thronged with people, waving their adieus as ardently as if we were booked for Australia. A bell, a whistle, and a sort of dull attempt at a scream, are, as in more civilized parts of the world, the signals for starting; we leave the weeping eyes and waving pocket handkerchiefs behind us, and, in the course of ten minutes, find, to our satisfaction, that we have increased our speed to fifteen miles an hour. We have hardly done so ere we arrive at a station. Everybody rushes out and lights a cigarette. We are to stop here ten minutes, and the people during that time walk up and down the platform and smoke; then we huddle into our old places, and have time to look about us.

The carriages are large. Nobody seems to go in the first-class. A second-class carriage accommodates about fifty people. They are built as in Austria and America, with a passage in the center, perambulated by a man in uniform, who occasionally asks people for their tickets. He seems to make inquiry the first time to satisfy himself that you have got one, and afterwards merely as an amusement, which he apparently enjoys the more if he fancies you are going to sleep. The men are bearded and dirty, and relate stories in a loud tone of voice, for the benefit of the whole company, most of whom have evidently never been in a railway before. At every station the same scene ensues. The unsmoked ends of the last station's cigars have been carefully preserved, and lighted afresh, and vehemently smoked on the platform during five or ten minutes, as the case may be. The stations are all very spacious and uniformly constructed, with an immense domed building for engines attached to each. Though there is only one passenger train daily, there are three goods trains, always well loaded with inland produce, tallow, fur, tea, &c., or with cotton from St. Petersburg to the interior. I should hardly think the line could possibly pay; but as it is a government concern, nobody has any means of ascertaining this fact. Whether it pays or not, the railway traveler in Russia soon discovers that the requirements of trade are as little regarded by government as his own personal convenience; for the restrictive policy of the empire must ever neutralize, in a great measure, the beneficial effects of rapid internal communication, while the difficulties which have always been placed in the way of free mercantile intercourse exist in full force, though the physical obstacles by which it has hitherto been encompassed are overcome. In fact, though the public cannot but be benefitted by the formation of railroads throughout a country, it is hardly for the public benefit that railroads are constructed here. Russian railroads seem to be meant for Russian soldiers; and it is the facility thus afforded of moving large bodies of men, that invests this mode of communication in Russia with an importance which does not attach to it in Great Britain, or, perhaps, any other country in Europe, to an equal extent. When St. Petersburg, Moscow, Odessa, and Warsaw become connected, Russia assumes an entirely new position with regard to the rest of Europe. A few days, instead of many months, will then suffice to concentrate the armies of the north and south upon the Austrian or Prussian frontiers. Through this same quarter of the world, many hundred years ago, poured those barbaric hordes which overran civilized Europe—it would, indeed, be a singular testimony to the spirit of the age, if the next invaders made their descent by means of railroads.

Ventilation.

The only ventilation practicable in the houses of the working classes is that which is termed natural ventilation, which is caused by the ascent of heated air; the air which becomes impure by the action of the lungs, or by the burning of candles, lamps, gas, &c., or by the fire, is heated, and rendered lighter than pure air; it therefore rises to the top, and cold, pure air takes its place. Thus, to ventilate a room well, it is essential that there should be two openings, one above, by means of which the impure, heated air can pass out, and another below, for the entrance of pure, cold air. In dwelling rooms, as ordinarily constructed, the impure air is imperfectly carried away by the draught of the chimney; it follows that the whole of the room above the level of the fire-place remains filled with air in a partially impure state; and the openings by which air is admitted are usually left to chance, the cracks around and under the doors and windows being the means by which it gains an entrance. If these are not sufficient to admit a proper quantity of air to supply the draught of the chimney, the latter necessarily smokes. A much better plan is, to admit the pure outer air by means of a plate of perforated zinc, placed, instead of a pane of glass, in the upper part of one or more of the windows furthest from the fire; the air entering through the zinc in small streams, becomes so mingled with the warm air of the room, that a draught is prevented, and when the windows are opposite the fire, the whole air of the room is gradually and imperceptibly changed. If to this mode of admitting pure, cold air, be added an opening in the chimney, near the ceiling, to allow the escape of the impure, warm air, much will be done for health and comfort; this opening in the chimney, however, requires a chimney-valve to prevent any downward draught of smoke. The utility of this mode of allowing air to enter and escape, for the purpose of ventilating rooms, is proved by its frequent and increasing adoption. Where appearance is an object, glass perforated with circular holes or slits may be employed instead of zinc, and chimney-valves are made of a very ornamental character. Cold air, it may be added, should never be admitted under the doors or at the bottom of a room, unless it be close to the fire or stove—otherwise it flows along the floor toward the fire-place, leaving the upper foul air unchanged, and cooling most unpleasantly and injuriously the feet and legs, which are most susceptible to atmospheric changes. THE CURSE OF INTEMPERANCE.—The Grand Jury of Allegheny County, (Pa.,) at their recent session, respectfully set forth "that for the last five years we have been engaged in the capacity of the grand inquest, sitting in and for the County of Allegheny; that during that time we found upward of one hundred and fifty true bills of indictment, and at the very lowest calculation four-fifths of this number are the results, either directly or indirectly, of the use of intoxicating liquors, thereby creating an enormous expense to be paid out of the public treasury, which must be replenished by imposing additional taxation upon the industrious portion of the community, and at the same time this unholy traffic is producing poverty, wretchedness, crime, and degradation that has a most ruinous and unhappy effect upon the public welfare."

SHEEP—REMEDY FOR WOUNDS.—Take the leaves of the elder tree, and make a strong decoction, and wash the parts injured from one to three times a day, and you will not be troubled with flies or worms on the wound. It also removes fever from the wound, and is healing. This is a good remedy, undoubtedly, but it cannot be used in winter; elder ointment can be. Scrape off the outer bark and throw away, then take the inner bark of elder sticks and boil it in at the rate of a stout handful to a pint of lard. This will make an excellent ointment. To make it a salve, add a little tar, or resin, or beeswax, or both, enough to make it sticky. It is equally good for man or beast. An ointment made in the same way with grated carrots, instead of elder bark, is equally good; some say better.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. "AN APOSTOLIC MINISTRY."

This is the title of a printed discourse delived by Rev. Dr. Wayland before the New York Baptist Union for Ministerial Education, at its annual meeting in Rochester, N. Y., on the 19th of July last. As the subject has been much discussed of late, our readers will no doubt be glad to know what view of it is taken by this distinguished minister and teacher. We therefore copy from the Christian Secretary the following synopsis of the discourse.

The text is Mark 16 : 15—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." He first shows what this gospel is. Next, what is meant by preaching it. We make the following extract to show his views on this point:—

"When the Israelites were bitten by the fiery flying serpents, and the bite was inevitably fatal, Moses was directed to set up a brazen serpent, with the assurance that whosoever that had been bitten, looked upon it should be healed. You can imagine how the first man who felt its saving efficacy flew to communicate the news to his brethren, and urge them to avail themselves of the remedy which had delivered him from death. Every man who was healed became immediately a herald of the glad tidings to others. Every one who was saved became a publisher of the salvation, or, in other words, a preacher, until in a few minutes the news spread throughout the encampment, and in this sense every tribe was evangelized.

"Allow me to illustrate the meaning of this term, as used by our Lord, by an occurrence of which I was an eye-witness. It so chanced, that, at the close of the last war with Great Britain, I was temporarily a resident of the city of New York. The prospects of the nation were shrouded in gloom. We had been for two or three years at war with the mightiest nation on earth, and, as she had now concluded a peace with the continent of Europe, we were obliged to cope with her single-handed. Our harbors were blockaded. Communication coast-wise between our ports was cut off. Our ships were rotting in every creek and cove where they could find a place of security. Our immense annual products were moulding in our ware-houses. The sources of profitable labor were dried up. Our currency was reduced to irredeemable paper. The extreme portions of our country were becoming hostile to each other, and differences of political opinion were embittering the peace of every household. The credit of the government was exhausted. No one could predict when the contest would terminate, or discover the means by which it could much longer be protracted.

"It happened that on a Saturday afternoon in February, a ship was discovered in the offing, which was supposed to be a cartel, bringing home our commissioners at Ghent, from their unsuccessful mission. The sun had set gloomily, before any intelligence from the vessel had reached the city. Expectation became painfully intense, as the hours of darkness drew on. At length a boat reached the wharf, announcing the fact that a treaty of peace had been signed, and was waiting for nothing but the action of our government to become a law.' The men on whose ears these words first fell, rushed in breathless haste into the city, to repeat them to their friends, shouting, as they ran through the streets, Peace! peace! peace! Every one who heard the sound repeated it. From house to house, from street to street, the news spread with electric rapidity. The whole city was in commotion. Men bearing lighted torches were flying to and fro, shouting like madmen, Peace! peace! peace! When the rapture had partially subsided, one idea occupied every mind. But few men slept that night. In groups they were gathered in the streets and by the fire-side, beguiling the hours of midnight by reminding each other that the agony of war was over, and that a worn-out and distracted country was about to enter again upon its wonted career of prosperity. Thus, every one becoming a herald, the news soon reached every man, woman and child in the city, and, in this sense, the city was evangelized. All this you see was reasonable and proper. But when Jehovah has offered to our world a treaty of peace, when men doomed to hell may be raised to seats at the right hand of God, why is not a similar zeal displayed in proclaiming the good news? Why are men perishing all around us, and no one has ever personally offered to them salvation through a crucified Redeemer?"

His third inquiry is, "Who is thus to preach the gospel?" In reply to this question, he says:—

"What would be the answer to this question, if we listened to the voice of common humanity? When the brazen serpent was lifted up, who was to carry the good news throughout the camp? When the glad tidings of peace arrived in the city, who was to proclaim it to his fellow-citizens? When the news of peace with God, through the blood of the covenant, is proclaimed to us, who of us shall make it known to those perishing in sin? The answer in each case is, every one. Were no command given, the common principles of our nature would teach us that nothing but the grossest selfishness would claim to be exempted from the joyful duty of extending to others the blessing which we have received ourselves."

He examines this part of his subject at length, and shows conclusively, that it is the duty of the whole church to preach the gospel. "A revival of religion," he says, "represents a church in its normal condition, the condition which Christ always intended it to maintain. Then every believer makes it his great concern to call men to repentance, not as a matter of form, but with earnest and moving persuasion. Every convert is inviting his former companions to turn unto the Lord. But, if this manner of life is appropriate to a revival, it is appropriate to all times; for men are everywhere and at all times sinners hastening to the judgment seat, and they must all perish unless they be redeemed by the blood of Christ."

His next position is, that it is the duty of some men to devote themselves exclusively to the ministry of the gospel. "If it be asked under what circumstances may a believer undertake this service?—I answer, the New Testament, as it seems to me, always refers to it as a calling to which a man is moved by the Holy Ghost. No one, therefore, may enter the ministry except from the motive of solemn, conscientious duty." "He must be conscious of a love for the work itself, and with the Apostle, he must be conscious that a necessity is laid upon him, yea, that a woe rests upon him, if he preach not the gospel."

The New Testament, he thinks, recognizes two forms of ministerial labor; that of evangelists, and that of pastors. Evangelists are specially preachers or missionaries. Pastors are placed over particular churches. The duties of pastors and evangelists are then defined:

"You see, then, my brethren, what is the New Testament idea of a church of Christ; it is a company of believers, each one united to Christ and pervaded by his spirit, and each one devoting every talent, whether ordinary or peculiar, to the work of evangelizing the world."

He then goes on to show the success that the Apostles met with in their day; alludes to the Burman mission, to Oncken and the German mission, and shows that these missions have been conducted upon the true apostolic principles. He [illegible] to our own country, and refers to the labors of a class of men who have now, mostly, gone to their rest.

"But it will perhaps be said, this is an example from a foreign country; would the same means for extending the reign of Christ avail us equally here at home? Cast your eyes backward, then, and look upon our own condition some fifty or sixty years since. The men are now living who remember the Baptist denomination when it was the least of the thousands of Israel. We are now among the most numerous, perhaps the most numerous communion in the United States. By what means has our increase been so astonishing? How has it come to pass, that believers in such multitudes have, through our instrumentality, been added to the Lord? I think the answer at once suggests itself, if we call to mind the character of the Baptists of the preceding generation. Though plain men, generally of ordinary education, they were men of prayer, full of the Holy Ghost, each one holding himself in a special manner responsible for making known to those that were around him the truth as it is in Jesus. They were men of conference and prayer meetings, and revivals of religion; who, in barns, in school rooms, and in private houses, wherever they could collect an audience, preached repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Every talent which a church discovered among its members was called into the service of Christ. There was scarcely a church amongst us which had not its lay preachers, or, as they were termed, licentiates. Of these, many from time to time entered the regular ministry, and thus pastors were supplied in proportion to our need. Our settled ministers labored not only in their own churches, but made frequent missionary tours in the more destitute regions in their vicinity, thus doing the work of evangelists. While we were thus, with singular earnestness, devoting all the means in our power to the service of Christ, the Lord added to us daily of such as should be saved. And nowhere could I appeal to the result of these labors with greater pleasure than in the very spot on which I stand. The numerous and flourishing churches that fill the whole of Western New York, this University, with all its strength in the present, and its boundless hopes for the future, all owe their existence to the self-denials, the preaching, the prayers of these plain, pious, venerable, and never to be forgotten men. 'They have labored, and you have entered into their labors.' Of late years our progress has been much less rapid. Our views in many of these respects have changed. May not this change in our views be connected with the change in our prosperity?

"These instances seem to me to throw some light upon the teachings of the New Testament on this subject. I fear that we are in danger in this matter of forsaking the instructions of Christ and his apostles, and following the traditions of men, not observing the tendencies to which they lead. The Reformers brought with them many of the errors of the church of Rome. May we not have derived, through them, some erroneous notions respecting the church and the Christian ministry? Can any one fail to perceive, that the views of our Hamburgh brethren on this subject are more in accordance with the New Testament, than those of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon, or John Knox?"

Dr. Wayland then turns to the subject matter of his discourse—Christian and Ministerial Education. He holds that men are under obligation, not only to use, but to improve every talent committed unto them. Now suppose it manifest that God has called a man to devote his whole time to the ministry of the word; it is obvious that the obligation to improve his talent to the utmost is specially imperative. The substance of his ideas on this point may be inferred from the following paragraph; premising that he advocates a thorough education whenever it is practicable.

"If it be then our purpose to provide the means of improvement for those among us who are called to the ministry, it has seemed to me that we should bear in mind these elementary ideas of our denomination on this subject. If we are willing to follow, and not lead, the Spirit of God—that is, if we educate no man for the ministry until we are satisfied, not that he may be, but that he has been called of God to the work of preaching the gospel—we shall always have among our candidates a large number of those who have passed the period of youth, and for whom the studies of youth would be unsuitable, if not useless. Yet these are the very men to whom appropriate culture would be specially valuable. Others, in various degrees, have been more favored with preparatory education, and the means for more extended discipline. The means and advantages of our candidates must, therefore, be exceedingly dissimilar. If, then, we would labor to give to the ministry the means of improvement, we must provide those means for them all. A system of ministerial education, adapted to the condition of but one in twenty of our candidates, commences with the avowed intention of doing but one-twentieth part of its work, and of helping those only who have the least need of its assistance. We should therefore provide for all our brethren whom God has called to this service, the best instruction in our power; adapted, as far as possible, not to any theoretical view, but to the actual condition of the mass of our candidates, leaving each individual, in the exercise of a sound and pious discretion, to determine the extent to which he is able to avail himself of our services. While means should be fully provided for pursuing an extended course of education, we must never lose sight of the large number of our brethren to whom an extended course would be impossible."

THE GRACE OF GOD ILLUSTRATED.

A clergyman once represented the conduct of awakened sinners towards God's offers of gratuitous salvation thus:—

A benevolent and rich man had a very poor neighbor, to whom he sent this message, "I wish to make you the gift of a farm." The poor man was pleased with the idea of having a farm, but was too proud to receive it as a gift. So he thought of the matter much and anxiously. His desire to have a home of his own was daily growing stronger, but his pride was great. At length he determined to visit him who had made the offer. But a strange delusion about this time seized him, for he imagined that he had a bag of gold So he came with his bag, and said to the rich man, "I have received your message, and have come to see you. I wish to own the farm, but I wish to pay for it. I will give you a bag of gold for it."

"Let us see your gold," said the owner of the farm.

The poor man opened his bag and looked, and his countenance was changed, and he said, "Sir, I thought it was gold, but I am sorry to say it is but silver; I will give you my bag of silver for your farm."

"Look again; I do not think it is even silver," was the solemn but kind reply.

The poor man looked, and as he beheld, his eyes were further opened, and he said, "How have I been deceived! It is no silver, but only copper. Will you sell me your farm for my bag of copper? You may have it all."

"Look again," was the only reply.

The poor man looked; tears stood in his eyes; his delusion seemed to be gone; and he said, "Alas! I am undone. It is not even copper. It is but ashes. How poor I am! I wish to own that farm, but I have nothing to pay. Will you give me the farm?"

The rich man replied, "Yes; that was my first and only offer. Will you accept it on such terms?"

With humility, but with eagerness, the poor man said, "Yes; and a thousand blessings on you for your kindness."

The fable is easily applied. Mather has well expressed the difference between grace and merit, in few words. "God was a God to Adam before he fell; but to be a God to sinners, this is grace. He was a God to Adam in innocency, by virtue of the covenant of works; but he is not a God to any sinner, but in the way of free grace." [Dr. Plumer.

GETTING CERTIFIED.

The banks of this city require that any person not known to the paying teller, on presenting a check drawn to his own name or order, shall furnish satisfactory proof of his personal identity, before the payment of the check. This is a necessary and a reasonable regulation, though we confess we have found it somewhat embarrassing. It is a little awkward for one who has been preaching for ten years in this city, and who has inculcated innumerable lessons of commercial honesty, to have his own integrity impeached and his word refused by a bank teller whenever he has occasion to draw upon those mysterious depositories of wealth that line the sides of Wall-street. But we so seldom go to Wall-street, and possibly Wall-street so seldom comes to church, that we never know each other when we meet face to face. Again and again have we been sent away empty from the counter, to look up Mr. A., B., or C., who could certify to our physiognomy. We have thought of presenting to the banks engraved copies of our outer man—no longer in demand—but the likeness is so often disputed that we fear this would only enhance the difficulty. After all, we would rather submit to the mortification and the inconvenience, than have a check drawn in our favor paid to somebody else.

But what does such a rule signify morally? It is the testimony of the great commercial community to the doctrine of the universal depravity of men. Any man who presents himself at the counter of a bank may be a forger or a thief. The liabilities to deception are so many, and the actual frauds so frequent, that nobody is to be trusted whose honesty is not certified. Men may listen on the Sabbath to a sermon on the native excellence of mankind in general, they may hear the doctrine of total depravity denounced as a libel upon human nature, and to such preaching may say Amen, but in Wall-street on Monday morning they will presume every stranger to be a rogue till they have evidence to the contrary. Now we do not suppose there is anything peculiar in the atmosphere or the experiences of Wall-street, that makes a suspicion of universal depravity so rife in that quarter; we believe this is the spontaneous, untrammeled testimony of human nature against itself, and we are quite willing to submit to the inconvenience of the rule for the sake of its confirmation of our Orthodoxy. MY MOTHER'S HOME.

All alone in a valley, half hid among flowers,
  Is a home I recall with a thrill of delight;
Its rose-scented walks, and its vine-covered bowers,
  I see them again in my fancy to-night.
'Tis the home of my mother! Each long vanished scene,
  That memory paints with a pencil of truth,
Comes over my soul like a beautiful dream
  Of the bright, happy days of my innocent youth.

The home of my mother! In dreams I may stray
  O'er the hills and the valleys so dear to my heart,
And taste the bright waters that flow in my way—
  The purest and sweetest that life can impart.
The birds sing as sweet to my listening ear,
  The flowers bloom as fragrant and beautiful now,
As when in my childhood I have wandered to hear,
  Or gather the roses to twine for my brow.

But a strain of soft music steals over my dreams,
  And the voice of my mother in tenderness comes O'er my spirit, so soft and so sad, it would seem Like echoes of angels from their bright starry homes.
Home of my mother! farewell; sorrow's tears
  Have dimmed the fond eyes that look back to thee now,
And the fond recollections of earlier years
  Only deepen the sadness that dwells on my brow.

THE FIRST MARRIAGE IN THE FAMILY.

"HOME!" How that little word strikes upon the heart-strings, awakening all the sweet memories that had slept in memory's chamber! Our home was a "pearl of price" among homes; not for its architectural elegance—for it was only a four gabled, brown, country house, shaded by two antediluvian oak trees; nor was its interior crowded with luxuries that charm every sense and come from every clime. Its furniture had grown old with us, for we remembered no other: could be, by daily scrubbing, was somewhat the worse for wear, it must be confessed.

But neither the house nor its furnishing makes the home; and the charm of ours lay in the sympathy that linked the nine that called it "home" to one another. Father, mother, and seven children—five of them gay hearted girls, and two boys, petted just enough not to be spoiled—not one link had ever been dropped from the chain of love, or one corroding drop fallen upon its brightness.

"One star differeth from another star in glory," even in the firmament of home. Thus—though we could not have told a stranger which sister or brother was dearest—from our gentle "eldest," an invalid herself, but the comforter and counsellor of all beside, to the curly haired boy, who romped and rejoiced in the appellation of "baby," given five years before—still, an observing eye would soon have singled out sister Ellen as the sunbeam of our heaven, the "morning star" of our constellation. She was the second in age, but the first in the inheritance of that load of responsibility which, in such a household, falls naturally upon the eldest daughter. Eliza, as I have said, was ill from early girlhood; and Ellen had shouldered all her burden of care and kindness, with a light heart and a lighter step. Up stairs and down cellar, in the parlor, nursery or kitchen—at the piano or the wash-tub—with pen, pencil, needle, or ladle—sister Ellen was always busy, always with a smile on her cheek, and a warble on her lip.

Quietly, happily, the months and years went by. We never realized that change was to come over our band. To be sure, when mother would look in upon us, seated together with our books, paintings, and needle work, and say, in her gentle way, with only half a sigh, "Ah, girls, you are living your happiest days!" we would glance into each other's eyes, and wonder who would go first. But it was a wonder that passed away with the hour, and ruffled not even the surface of our sisterly hearts. It could not be always so—and the change came at last!

Sister Ellen was to be married!

It was like the crash of a thunder bolt in a clear summer sky! Sister Ellen—the fairy of the hearth-stone, the darling of every heart—which of us could spare her? Who had been so presumptuous as to find out her worth? For the first moment, this question burst from each surprised, half angry sister of the blushing, tearful Ellen! It was only for a moment; for our hearts told us that nobody could help loving her, who had ever looked through her loving blue eyes, into the clear well-spring of the heart beneath. So we threw our arms around her, and hid our faces on her shoulder and lap, and sobbed without a word!

We knew very well, that the young clergyman, whose Sabbath sermons and gentle admonitions had won all hearts, had been, for months, a weekly visitor to our fireside circle. With baby Georgie on his knee, and Georgie's brothers and sisters clustered about him, he had sat through many an evening, charming the hours away, until the clock startled us with its unwelcome nine o'clock warning; and the softly spoken reminder, "Girls, it is bed time!" woke more than one stifled sigh of regret. Then, sister Ellen must always go with us, to lay Georgie in his little bed; to hear him and Annette repeat the evening prayer and hymn her lips had taught them; to comb out the long brown braids of Emily's head; to rob Arthur of the story book over which he would have squandered "the midnight oil;" and to breathe a kiss and a blessing over the pillow of each other sister, as she tucked the warm blankets tenderly about them.

We do not know how often, of late, she had stolen down again, from these sisterly duties, after our senses were locked in sleep; or if our eyes and ears had ever been open to the fact, we could never have suspected the minister to be guilty of such a plot against our peace! That name was associated, in our minds, with all that was superhuman. The gray-haired pastor, who had gone to his grave six months previous, had sat as frequently on that same oaken arm-chair, and talked with us. We had loved him as a father and friend, and had almost worshiped him as the embodiment of all attainable goodness. And when Mr. Neville came among us, with his high pale forehead, and soul-kindled eye, we had thought his face also "the face of an angel"—too glorious for the print of mortal passion! Especially, after, in answer to an urgent call from the people among whom he was laboring, he had frankly told them that his purpose was not to remain among them, or anywhere on his native shore; that he only waited the guidance of Providence to a home in a foreign clime. After this much bewailed disclosure of his plans, we placed our favorite preacher on a higher pinnacle of saintship.

But sister Ellen was to be married—and married to Mr. Neville! And then—"O, sister, you are not going away to India!" burst from our lips, with a fresh gush of sobs.

I was the first to look up into Ellen's troubled face. It was heaving with emotions that ruffled its calmness, as the tide-waves ruffle the sea. Her lips were firmly compressed; her eyes were fixed on some distant dream, glassed with two tears, that stood still in their chalices, forbidden to fall. I almost trembled as I caught her glance.

"Sisters! Agnes—Emily!" she exclaimed in a husky whisper—"Hush! be calm! Don't break my heart! Do I love home less than"—

The effort was too much; the words died on her lips. We lifted her to the bed, frightened into forgetfulness of our own grief. We soothed her until she, too, wept freely and passionately, and, in weeping, grew strong for the sacrifice to which she had pledged her heart.

We never spoke another word of remonstrance to her tender heart, though often, in the few months that flitted by us together, we used to choke with sobbing, in some speech that hinted of the coming separation, and hurry from her presence to cry alone.

Our mother has told us the tidings, with white lips that quivered tenderly and sadly. No love is so uniformly unselfish as a mother's surely; for though she had leaned on Ellen as sorrowed not, as we did, that she was going. She was too happy in the thought that her child had found that "pearl of price" in a cold and evil world—a true, noble, loving heart, to guide and protect her.

Father sat silently in the chimney corner, reading in the large family Bible. He was looking further than any of us—to the perils that would environ his dearest daughter, and the privations that might come upon her young life, in that unhealthy, uncivilized corner of the globe, whither she was going. But both our parents had dedicated their children to God; and they would not cast even a shadow on the path of self-sacrifice and duty their darling had chosen.

To come down to the unromantic little details of wedding preparations; how we stitched and trimmed, packed and prepared—how we stoned raisins, with tears in our eyes, and seasoned the wedding cake with sighs. But there is little use in thinking over these things. Ellen was first and foremost in all, as she had always been in every emergency, great or small. Nothing could be made without her. Even the bride's cake was taken from the oven by her own fair hands, because no one—servant, sister, or even mother—was willing to run the risk of burning sister Ellen's bride's cake; and she "knew just how to bake it."

We were not left alone in our labors; for Ellen had been loved by more than the home-roof sheltered. Old and young, poor and rich, united in bringing their gifts, regrets, and blessings to the chosen companion of the pastor they were soon to lose. There is something in the idea of missionary life that touches the sympathy of every heart which mammon has not too long seared. To see one, with sympathies and refinements like our own, rend the strong ties that bind to country and home, comfort and civilization, for the good of the lost and degraded heathen, brings too strongly into relief, by contrast, the selfishness of most human lives led among the gayeties and luxuries of time.

The day, the hour, came. The ship was to sail from B., on the ensuing week; and it must take away an idol.

She stood up in the village church, that all who loved her, and longed for another sight of her sweet face, might look upon her, and speak the simple words that should link hearts for eternity. We sisters stood all around her, but not too near; for our hearts were overflowing, and we could not wear the happy faces that should grace a train of bridesmaids. She had cheered us through the day, with sunshine from her own heart, and even while we were arraying her in her simple white muslin, like a lamb for sacrifice, she had charmed our thoughts into cheerfulness. It seemed like some dream of fairy land, and she the embodiment of grace and loveliness, acting the part of some queen Titania for a little while. The dream changed to a far different reality, when, at the door of her mother's room, she put her hand into that of Henry Neville, and lifted her eye with the look that said, "Where thou goest will I go," even from all beside!

Tears fell fast in that assembly; though the good old matrons tried to smile, as they passed around the bride, to bless her and bid her good-bye. A little girl, in a patched but clean frock, pushed forward, with a bouquet of violets and strawberry blossoms in her hand.

"Here, Miss Nelly—please, Miss Nelly," she cried, half laughing, half sobbing, "I picked them on purpose for you."

Ellen stooped and kissed the little eager face. The child burst into tears, and caught the folds of her dress, as though she would have buried her face there. But a strong armed woman, mindful of the bride's attire, snatched the child away.

"And for what would ye be whimpering in that style, as if you had any right to Miss Ellen?"

"She was always good to me, and she's my Sunday-School teacher!" plead the little girl, in a subdued undertone.

Agnes drew her to her side, and silently comforted her.

"Step aside—Father Herrick is here!" said one just then.

The crowd about the bridal pair opened, to admit of a white haired, half blind old man, who came leaning on the arm of his rosy granddaughter. Father Herrick was a superannuated deacon, whose good words and works had won for him a place in every heart of that little assembly.

"They told me she was going," he murmured to himself; "they say 'tis her wedding. I want to see my little girl again—bless her."

Ellen sprang forward, and laid both her white, trembling hands in the large hands of the good old man. He drew her near his failing eyes, and looked searchingly into her young, soul-lit countenance.

"I can just see you, darling; and they tell me I shall never see you again! Well, well—if we go in God's way, we shall all get to heaven; and it's all light there!" He raised his hand over her head, and added, solemnly, "The blessing of blessings be upon thee, my child. Amen!"

"Amen!" echoed the voice of Henry Neville.

And Ellen looked up with the look of an angel.

So she went from us! O, the last moment of that parting hour has burnt itself into my being forever! Could the human heart endure the agony of parting like that, realized to be indeed the last—lighted by no ray of hope for eternity? Would not reason reel under the pressure?

It was hard to bear; but I have no words to tell of its bitterness. She went to her missionary life; and we learned, at last, to live without her; though it was many a month before the little ones could forget to call on "Sister Ellen" in any impulse of joy, grief, or childish want. Then the start, and the sigh, "O, dear, she's gone—sister is gone!" And fresh tears would flow.

"Gone, but not lost;" for that First Marriage in the family opened to us a fountain of happiness, pure as the spring of self-sacrifice could make it. Our household darling has linked us to a world of needy and perishing spirits—[illegible] us, and to those who remain in the dear country of their birth. God bless her and her charge! Dear sister Ellen!—there may be many another breach in the family—we may all be scattered to the four winds of heaven—but no change can come over us like that which marked the First Marriage.

DANIEL A MODEL TO MEN OF BUSINESS.

Daniel was a busy statesman. Darius had made him his chief minister. He had charge of the royal revenue, and was virtual ruler of the empire. But amidst all cares of office he maintained his wonted practice of praying three times a day. For these prayers nothing was neglected. The administration of justice was not standing still; the accounts did not run into confusion. There was no mutiny in the army, no rebellion in the provinces, from any mismanagement of his. And though disappointed rivals were ready to found an impeachment on the slighest flaw, so wise and prompt and impartial was his proceedure, that they at last concluded, "We shall find no occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of God." He found leisure to rule the realm of Babylon, and leisure to pray three times a day. Some would say that he must have been a first-rate business man, to find so much time for prayer. It would be nearer the truth to say, that it was his taking so much time to pray which made him so diligent and successful in business. It was from God that Daniel got his knowledge, his wisdom, and his skill. In the composure and serenity which these frequent approaches to God imparted to his spirit, as well as in the supernatural sagacity and forethought and power of arrangement, which God gave in direct answer to his prayers, he had a decided advantage over those men who, refusing to acknowledge God in their callings, vex themselves in vain, and who, when the fret, the worry and sweltering of their jaded day is done, find that they have accomplished less, and that little far more painfully, than their wiser brethren, who took time to pray. The man must be busier than Daniel who has not time to pray, and wiser than Daniel who can do what Daniel did without prayer to help him. Daniel was in a place where prayer was eminently needful. He was in Babylon, a place of luxury and revelry, and from his position in society he was peculiarly exposed to the idolatrous and voluptuous temptations around him. It was difficult, and ere long it was dangerous, to maintain his singularity. But so far as there was any seduction in the pleasures of that luxurious and wicked city, prayer kept him separate; and so far as there was any danger in withholding countenance from its idol-orgies, prayer made him bold. Though the clash of cymbals and the shouts of the revelers were coming in at his window, they did not disturb his devotion; and though he had not forgotten the King's decree and the lion's den, he did not close the lattice, nor try to conceal his faith and his worship; and secure alike from spiritual detriment and personal danger, the Lord hid his praying servant in the hollow of his hand.

The above is ascribed to Dr. James Hamilton. The article accords well with the Spanish proverb, "Prayer and provender hinder neither man nor beast:" that is, real, heartfelt prayer As in the case of prophet Daniel, it makes a man both diligent and courageous. How can it be otherwise? Of whom should a devout person be afraid, and how can a spiritually-minded person be indolent? Who has ever known a praying man or woman who was either a drone or coward?

A HINDOO CAVILER SILENCED.

As Mr. Thomas was one day addressing a crowd of Hindoos on the banks of the Ganges, he was accosted by a brahmin as follows: "Sir, don't you say that the devil tempts men to sin?" "Yes," answered the missionary. "Then," said the brahmin, "certainly the fault is the devil's; the devil, therefore, and not man, ought to suffer the punishment." Just then observing a boat descending the river, Mr. Thomas directed his attention to it, and said, "Brahmin, do you see yonder boat?" "Yes." "Suppose I were to send some of my friends to destroy every person on board, and bring me all that is valuable in the boat; who ought to suffer punishment? I, for instructing them, or they for doing the wicked act?" "Why," answered the brahmin, "you ought all to be put to death together." "Ay," replied Mr. Thomas, "if you and the devil sin together, you and the devil will be punished together."

THE DUTY OF EVERY CHRISTIAN TO PREACH THE GOSPEL.

What shall be done to increase the moral power of the Church? How shall she be made "terrible as an army with banners?" To her is entrusted the gospel of Christ—that instrumentality which has proved itself mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds—the only agency which has ever proved adequate to the salvation of souls—that she may hold it forth, and try its power upon every creature. To some extent she has fulfilled her mission. Europe and America have heard of the only Saviour, and multitudes in other parts of the world have been taught the way of life through his name. Still the question arises, Might she not have done more? Might she not now do more? And what hinders her usefulness as an agency for converting souls to God?

We shall not undertake to set forth all the hindrances to her usefulness, but we believe that a very serious one consists in this—that her members have, to a very great extent, lost sight of their own personal responsibility with regard to making known the gospel, and committed it to ministers. Few are the efforts now made by the "laity" to guide the perishing into the way of life; it is a work almost exclusively done by those who have been ordained to the business of teaching.

Now we see nothing in the Scriptures to indicate that it is not quite as much the duty of church members to labor for the conversion of souls, as it is of their minister. The injunction of Christ, to preach the gospel to every creature, was not given exclusively to ministers, but to the whole church. The idea that it was intended for the Apostles, and for their successors in the ministry, finds no support in the context, nor any where else in the Sacred Volume. It was intended for all who love their Saviour, whether ministers or people, men or women. It was intended, that each individual believer should feel himself under obligation to speak to his fellow creatures of the fullness of grace and truth that is in Jesus Christ, and exhort them to flee from the wrath to come. And we verily believe that, till the people awake to this duty, and feel themselves under as strict obligation with regard to it as they do with regard to any duty of the moral law, the power of the Church will continue to wane, the world will abide under the dominion of Satan, and few and faint will be the lights shining in the darkness that covers the multitude.

Ministers often complain, (and with truth,) that their efforts to lead sinners to Christ are rendered nugatory by the worldliness of the Church. They labor carefully to set forth the truth, and prove, to a demonstration, that the wrath of God is upon the unbelieving. But so long as the unbelieving see the Church living in conformity to the world, her members acting as if they did not themselves recognize the necessity of being consecrated to God, what does the preaching amount to? Indeed, it is an admitted principle, on all sides, that only through the example of holiness of life on the part of those who profess Christianity, can the preaching of the gospel be of any avail.

Now, while many, alas! too many, are but indifferently careful on this point, acting as if they thought it made but little difference whether they adhered strictly to the law of righteousness, or not, the few whose consciences impel them to walk uprightly, do, nevertheless, shrink from that particular mode of manifesting their love of holiness, which it is the object of these remarks to enforce. They are willing to do justly towards their fellow creatures; they would not, for the world, wrong any man; they are kind to the poor, merciful to those who are in distress, compassionate towards all; beautiful and lovely are they in their lives altogether. But do they speak of Christ? Do they aim to set him forth as a Saviour, full of grace and truth? Do they recommend him, as they go, and show any anxiety to tell others what a precious Friend and Saviour they have found? Yet this is just what the Great Commission binds them to do. Any thing short of this is failure in Christian duty. This is the manner in which Christ would have his people evince their holiness. This is the inspired plan—the divinely prescribed plan—the plan which Christ himself marked out; and we commit a great error, when we depart from it, or attempt in any respect to modify it.

The plan of indirectly recommending Christianity by simply observing that righteousness which is enjoined in the Moral Law—a righteousness which commands universal esteem—is good, as far as it goes. It is by no means to be neglected. The Saviour himself enjoined it. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Matt. 7: 12. But it is not enough. The Christian's righteousness—we speak not of that which justifies him before God—is defective, if he does not directly speak of, and recommend, Jesus Christ as the only Saviour of sinners. For neglecting this duty, his conscience ought to reproach him; and when he comes clearly to understand, that the great end and design of his being reckoned among God's "peculiar people" is, "that he may SHEW FORTH THE PRAISES of him who hath called him out of darkness into his marvelous light," it will reproach him.

It is true, that this kind of righteousness is not had in esteem among men. Those who practice it must expect to find it counted loathsome by them that are yet in their sins. Carnal wisdom would, therefore, say, Let just dealings with mankind, and kindness to the afflicted, be the sole method of recommending the gospel. But, planting ourselves upon the word of inspiration, we say, No. Let justice be done to man, and all necessary kindness shown to the afflicted, but by no means omit to show them the way of life through a Redeemer.

Is it objected, that to go about preaching Christ crucified is no certain indication of holiness, because many that have done so have been proved to be wicked men, notwithstanding their noisy profession? We answer, that this objection is valid so far as it relates to the public preaching of the gospel by ministers regularly appointed for the work. With them it is a regular profession, or trade, to stand up from time to time, and harangue the people upon the various points of doctrine embraced in the Christian religion. They are set apart to the work of investigating the Scriptures, and their sermons are the result of study; and if they choose to regard iniquity in their hearts, notwithstanding their public declamations in religion's favor, they can easily do it. Alas! that there have been so many wolves in sheep's clothing.

But though a man may stand up before a public assembly, and give a set discourse upon religion, and still be a bad man at heart, he cannot do the kind of preaching we refer to, unless he is a truly good man. He cannot, in a familiar, conversational way, recommend Christ to his perishing neighbors, unless his own life is measureably free from reproach. He will dread having his own inconsistencies thrown back upon him. In fact, he has no heart for any such work. None but the truly good—none but those whose bowels move with love and mercy, and are ever ready to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction—none but those who love righteousness, and hate iniquity, can feel any concern for them that are living without God in the world; no others will heartily labor for their salvation. Show us those whose hearts are so full of the love of Christ, that they are always talking about him, and recommending him, and we will show you holy men and women.

Do not facts—does not experience—confirm what we say? When a church becomes revived—when its light begins to shine—when its power begins to be felt in the surrounding community, what kind of conduct do we witness in its members? Do they not begin to charge themselves with guilt, because they have neglected to warn their neighbors? Do they not immediately bestir themselves in this matter? Do they not talk to their families, to their friends, to all around, and tell them Christ is precious? They do. They all do it, not devolving it exclusively upon their minister. And while they continue so doing, the work of the Lord goes on; their own souls are edified, and sinners are saved.

But in so little measure are church members imbued with the love of Christ, that they grow weary of this work. After a short season spent in it, in which they seem to think that they have made wonderful sacrifices, they recollect that they have a minister, one whom they have hired to do such business, and they fall back into their old habits again. The minister finds himself unable to work alone, and he, too, soon sinks to the level of his people. "Like people, like priest." The church then ceases to exert a holy influence. Sinners that had been awed into respectful behaviour for a time, begin to resume their boldness. Satan is let loose again, and the church becomes a by-word in community. 'What is the church good for?' asks the infidel; and the church finds it difficult to answer the question.

A SCOTCHMAN'S OPINION OF AMERICA.

Wm. Chambers, Esq., of Edinburgh, Scotland, has been for three months past on a tour of observation through the British American Provinces and the United States. On the eve of departure for home, he writes to the N. Y. Tribune, under date of Dec. 13, expressing his sincere thanks for the kindness that has been extended to him, and for the opportunities he has enjoyed of becoming acquainted with the social and political characteristics of the country. He says:—

I leave the United States with much regret. I carry with me the conviction that a great and splendid future is before them. Contrary to the opinion of most travelers from England, I see here a young but rapidly growing nation offering an example to the oldest communities in Europe. It is far from my wish to flatter; but what do I not feel vast delight in seeing? I am overcome with the stupendous proportions and capacity of the country—its far-stretching fields for human subsistence and happiness. Of the American people, so little understood, and often misrepresented, I candidly own that their remarkable love of order, their energy and perseverance, their love of independence, the self-respect of even the humblest classes among them, their striking sobriety, their admirable educational systems, their many excellent libraries and universal fondness for reading, their press free from fiscal exactions, their flourishing religious institutions untampered by civil polity, their economically and spiritedly got up railways, now pushed half way to the Pacific, the neatness of their dwellings, their wonderful—and, to an Englishman, alarming—progress in the mechanical arts, the marvelous growth of their cities, and I will add their civilty to strangers—I say all this gives me unqualified pleasure; and when I contrast their cities, free of pauperism and vice in its most loathsome forms, with what meets the eye in London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other large cities in Britain, I feel that travelers from the old country have really little reason to speak disdainfully of America, or to exaggerate faults which at most are only partial and of no sort of account.

SKETCHES FROM NOTES OF A TOUR THROUGH VIRGINIA AND OHIO.

New Salem is rather a central point of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches of Virginia; having West Union fifteen miles on the west, Hughes' River about thirty-eight miles on the south-west, and Lost Creek about twenty miles on the south-east. The Church at Woodbridgetown, Pa., which also belongs to the Association, is about fifty miles, perhaps, a little east of north.

Lost Creek is a tributary of the West Branch of the Monongahela River. Its course is mainly West; and its confluence with the river is near the southern boundary of Harrison County. It takes its name, Tradition says, not, as one might infer, from its mysterious disappearance somewhere in its course, but from the circumstance that some person, in traversing the wilderness in this region, lost his way, and was discovered on this creek. The settlement of Sabbath-keepers here, is along this stream, commencing near its mouth; some living in Harrison County, and some in Lewis, the next county South. The Church here, at the time of its organization, which was nearly fifty years ago, was mostly made up of converts to the Sabbath. The same is also true of the Hughes' River Church. But the other churches consist mainly of those who observed the Sabbath when they came to this country, or those who have descended from them.

This Church (and I believe all the others) holds "Quarterly Meetings" for worship, continuing two days—Sabbath and First-day; in which they expect to be joined by more or less of their brethren from other churches. They also celebrate the Lord's Supper on such occasions. Besides these, they hold a "Yearly Meeting," not differing from them, materially, excepting what is indicated in the name.

It was "Quarterly Meeting" at the time of my visit at Lost Creek, and I had been urgently requested by Eld. Samuel D. Davis, their minister, for that reason, to be there at that time. The people here, as in almost every other place which I visited, presented a rather downcast and dejected appearance, expressive of a fear that the present declining condition of affairs among them will result in the extinction of that isolated light, which God's neglected Sabbath has shed upon this region since the time when the curling smoke arose here from the "council fires" of the native red man. Bro. Davis, though the prospect looks dark, continues to labor, what time he can spare from the scene of his manual toil; in which he, like the rest of the ministers here, is obliged to engage for the support of his family. Oh, how my heart was moved with sympathy for him, when, on parting, I held him by the hand, and saw his eyes fill with the tears of discouragement! I could but offer an earnest prayer, that he might see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. Besides his labor at home, he goes once a month or oftener to New Salem. He is, thus, now that Eld. Peter Davis, their minister, has become infirm, returning to that church the kindness which he, in his earlier life, manifested to the church at Lost Creek, in visiting and laboring there for many years.

They have a frame meeting-house here, which will compare favorably with any I saw in the rural districts of the country. Yet, Time, left to do the painting, has fixed upon it a rather somber hue. Its erection, which must have been quite an achievement when it took place, is attributed to the influence of Eld. Joel Greene, during his labors there as a missionary.

Those who in former years were there as missionaries, were often mentioned, both here and elsewhere, with great interest. There are many living witnesses of their usefulness, who refer to them as the instruments of their first religious awakening. Among those who were referred to in this connection, no one was more frequently mentioned than Eld. Amos R. Wells. These master-strokes of the panoramic pencil are far more distinctly visible since Time has removed this part of the picture so far in the distance, than they were when it was directly before the eye of the interested observer. Such occurrences illustrate the truth of the declaration, that the immediately perceptible fruits of missionary labor do not always furnish reliable data from which to judge of its importance and usefulness. Had the work been vigorously prosecuted on this field, it is more than probable, that the success of the Sabbath cause here would have been, at this time, a "fixed fact," instead of a problem, upon the solution of which the surviving Simeons and Annas are waiting in painful solicitude for light from Heaven.

Having attended the Quarterly Meeting, and made a number of pleasant acquaintances, First-day afternoon I returned with Eld. Peter Davis to New Salem; and the next day, Sept. 12th, my host, Jesse F. Randolph, one of the early settlers of this country, carried me to West Union, where I had an appointment for the evening, "being ready to depart on the morrow."

Our people here, in common with those about them, have labored under many embarrassments unknown in the Free States. The interests of slave labor and those of free labor are irreconcilable antagonists, and the triumph of one is the defeat of the other. Though there are but few slaves in the Western part of the State, the institution of slavery has here, as it does everywhere, spread a blight upon the interests of free labor throughout the whole domain, over which the policy and laws prevail which are adapted to its support.

The natural resources of this country are superior to those of the most of New England. The climate is comparatively mild; and though the surface is, to one who has not seen it, or something like it, almost inconceivably rough, yet there is scarcely any of it but what may be turned to good account for agricultural purposes. The soil is well adapted to the growth of wheat and corn, and various other valuable productions; but especially to grazing. Still, where it has been settled fifty or sixty years, it is, comparatively, a wilderness. The materials used for building, the appearance, or non-appearance, of the roads, the limited extent of land under cultivation, and the operation of storing hay and grain, of feeding cattle and threshing, all under the wide canopy of Heaven, if in the North, would say, "Stranger, this is a new country." There is a vast profusion of available water-power; yet the streams go rushing on to the great City of Waters, unobstructed in their course, save to lazily move the saw in some rude mill, that has set up a feeble opposition to the mallet and frower, or the grinding-stone of some other, which, to make an equitable distribution of service between water and muscular power, perhaps, gives the grinding to one, and the bolting to the other.

The country, however, has very sensibly improved, within a few years. It has been rendered accessible by the construction of turnpikes. One, the North-Western, I believe it is called, comes across the mountains from the East, and terminates at Parkersburgh, on the Ohio River. New Salem and West Union are situated on this road. Another is in progress, passing New Milton. There is, also, a Railroad in progress from Parkersburgh, to intersect the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad not far from Fetterman. Excepting a few variations, this Road lies along the North-Western Turnpike. These public works have created markets for the products of agriculture, and facilities for the transportation of goods, for which they may be profitably exchanged.

Could Western Virginia divorce her faithless counterpart, and be erected into a Sovereign State, with a government and laws suited to the development of her vast resources, in the way of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and an efficient system of education, there would scarcely be a limit to her attainable progress in all that relates to temporal prosperity. Indeed, with the forests reduced to desirable limits, and every place made accessible by well-wrought roads; the hill-sides covered with sheep for the shearer, or cows for the dairy; the vallies dotted with school-houses, churches, villas, towns and cities; the idle streams compelled to ply, to their utmost capacity, the polished machinery of the manufacturer; isolated dells made acquainted with each other by the perforation of intervening hills, for the passage of the railroad track, upon which the rushing "iron horse" makes his way with his train, freighted with the products of industry, or the devotees of bustling travel—now lost in his rocky retreat—now threading the tortuous ravine; it would be one of the most enchantingly beautiful portions of the earth. It would be wildness domesticated by the petting hand of enterprise, and would offer an inviting retreat for those who love to commune with Nature when in her most favorite mood for mirth and gambol.

OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

The Committee on Outfit have not yet determined the time and place of embarkation for Brethren Jones and Saunders, but hope soon to be able to announce the place where the articles for shipment may be sent. Several communications have been made to the Committee, quite encouraging to the cause. The brethren in Mystic, Ct., have done nobly. They have circulated a paper for subscriptions, of which the following is a copy:—

"We the undersigned, desiring to afford our hearty coöperation with the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Board, in support of their commendable resolution to associate with their missionary operations in Palestine an Industrial or Agricultural Department; and believing it to be our duty to afford to the suffering and destitute inhabitants of that country, the means for improving their temporal as well as spiritual condition; and believing that attention to the former is the primary and most reliable means of affecting the latter, and exhibiting to the unenlightened world the true spirit and mission of the Gospel of CHRIST—we do therefore agree to pay the sums attached to our respective names for providing the outfit of the said Industrial Department."

More than three hundred dollars have been subscribed for the purposes above set forth, as we are informed by Bro. Greenman.

The following is from the vicinity of Carbondale, Penn:—

To the Committee on Outfit of the Palestine Mission:—

As we are anxious to lend a hand to carry the good tidings of the Gospel to the Jews, we will enclose ten dollars, and pray that it may be blest of the Lord to the conversion of many souls to the truth. As we have always had a very favorable opinion of Bro. Jones, our faith is strong that his teaching will be blest of God. This from a brother and wife living remote from the society of Seventh-day Baptists. Pray for us, that God will raise up here a people that will be willing to keep all his laws.

Yours affectionately, P. C. KENYON,
ABBEY KENYON.

We say to all, "Go thou and do likewise." Other communications and remittances have been received, which will be noticed in their place.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following extract of a letter from Mrs. Miner to her son, will be of interest to all interested in the affairs of Palestine; and therefore has been solicited for publication in the Recorder.

NEW YORK, Dec. 16th, 1853.

LETTER FROM PALESTINE.

PLAIN OF SHARON, Oct. 24, 1853.

MY BELOVED SON—It is about three months, I believe, since I wrote last, having deferred writing to hear from you and our other friends at home, in reference to our settlement in this place. The loving-kindness of the Lord has been daily manifested to us, and our humble effort has been truly prospered, considering the small means in our power. The health of our family has been good, and the heat not so great as we anticipated; through July and August the thermometer rising but one day as high as 85 degrees at noon in our house during these months. The sea-breeze has been so invigorating, that I have not failed myself of being actively engaged in the bêarrah (garden) over three hours in the morning and three in the evening, more than four times, I believe, since we commenced our work here.

All the varieties of vegetables which we have planted have produced well—except one crop of beans, in the hottest months. Another summer we shall better understand their season. Our Indian corn, sweet potatoes, tomatoes, egg-plants, beets, and Lima beans, are all very fine; and a little sample patch of cotton is now five feet high, and covered with pods and flowers—though planted in July! We are gaining a necessary experience, even by our small beginning, in the management of the artificial irrigation and seasons of planting, &c., so different from our farmer's practice at home, which we trust will not be lost.

We have many applications from poor Jews for clothing and medicine and employment. We have distributed (prudently) to the most needy the clothing we have received, and what we could spare of our own; also medicine to many of the sick. We have still some of the heavy goods, sent by Presbyterian friends, reserved for winter. If the donors could see their suffering need, and hear their affecting appeals and grateful thanks for the least aid, they could not fail to rejoice in the offering they have sent, and it is our earnest prayer, that they may receive eternal blessing in return. The "chiniodine"—sent in the box of medicine from Dr. Engles—has been very effective in curing the ague among the poor, who, on recovery, will often come and bring a present of a few pomegranates or other fruit, making many acknowledgments, praying for "the peace and long life of the Americans." How happy we should be, if these little testimonies of gratitude could be laid on the table of the benevolent giver.

The land-owners—Mahommedans and Christians—near us, beg us to settle permanently among them, and offer us any choice and quantity of land, improved gardens, with houses and wells, and lands on the plains unimproved. There are a number of very favorable situations, of rich soil, urged upon us at a very low rate, as near as we can judge, at from $8 to $10 per acre, according to nearness to Jaffa.

There is only one serious diffculty in the way of an abundant return from agriculture here, and that is, the labor and expense of raising water for irrigation through the hot months, in the present clumsy Arab fashion—the only resource here. If we had one of our simple Yankee chain-pumps, we could, at a small expense, easily supply our grounds, as the water is enexhaustible. Do try and send us one of these pumps immediately, so that we can put it in order by April next, and try its power. If such an one would succeed, (and, if I remember aright, they are not expensive,) we could easily introduce hundreds, among the gardens here, at a fair price—as the Arab farmers are very anxious for an improvement, and often inquire if we have nothing better to draw water with in our country. The expense of the present machinery, feeding mules, &c., is all that prevents this rich, extensive plain, from being soon covered with farms, as the inhabitants have an increasing interest in agriculture. What a benevolent work would it be, to bring water within the reach of the industrious poor—now only enjoyed by the rich.

The principal men of the Jews continue very friendly to us. The President and Chief Rabbi of Jaffa is much interested for us—cultivates a garden himself—frequently visits us. The second Rabbi of Jerusalem (called by our Jews "a very great one,") came to see us recently, and spent the night and part of two days in our house, for the purpose of becoming personally acquainted with us. After visiting the gardens, and seeing our manner and work, he expressed himself very strongly, as gratified and pleased with our effort, and voluntarily remarked, "that any time he would engage to send us a hundred laborers to work with us."

We also receive frequent testimonies of the kind feelings of the Arabs around us; they are kind and obliging, and very grateful for the least favor. Many sick beg for medicine; and, as I return from the garden before noon, I often find numbers waiting on the door-steps. The kind hand of the Lord has relieved many by the simple remedies with which we are familiar, and it is very affecting to hear their prayers for our blessing when healed. I would here entreat, if any medical friend can advise any general specific for the common inflamed sore eyes, so prevalent among the poor here, and also for ophthahmia, and such remedies could be sent prepared with careful directions, that it may be sent, and it would ensure great relief of human misery.

Through September we have had very pleasant weather—many cloudy days, and two small showers of rain. In the "hill country" they had rain last week, and we have heavy clouds, and every appearance now of the rain setting in. We have been very busy the last three weeks, putting in the winter crop of vegetables—beets, peas, beans, turnips and cabbage—as there is no frost here. After the first rain we expect to sow some wheat, oats, buckwheat, clover, and field horse-beans, and we have great hope of raising something considerable to sell this winter.

There is much talk about war with Russia, and some of the inhabitants are in fear from the unsettled state of the Government; but we have felt no alarm, and feel as safe here as we used to do in our cottage in West Philadelphia.

At present we have a vacation, as our Jews are gone to Jerusalem and to Jaffa to keep their great autumnal feast. Our means for their employ is nearly exhausted, and unless we receive additional aid, from friends of Israel at home, we shall be under the painful necessity of denying them further aid. Some cases are so desperate, and their entreaties so urgent, that we suffer much in refusing them. A wide door is open for their relief, and for access to their hearts, in the most moderate expenditure. Nothing but means is wanting—any amount of good soil is offered on most reasonable terms, and the poor Jew, who has been almost idle and disabled for these long centuries, is appealing now to Christians—for charity in continued idleness? No! for employment, and wages only sufficient for his cheapest existence.

Several German families live near us, who came here in religious love for this land during the disturbances in their own country in 1848–9 They are poor, but industrious, and have succeeded, in great privation, to earn their bread. They have learned the language, and seek employ in agriculture, at the lowest wages here, rather than more advantageous terms in any other land. Such might be useful as honest, active helpers, if Christians would be inclined to extend this work, as the Jews are so ignorant and feeble (from long disuse) it is indispensable that they should have teachers and laboring helpers with them to secure a profitable return for the labor and expenditure. One of these Germans (John G.) is living in our family for two months past, and has become so convinced that God is with us, that he has resolved with all his heart to devote himself to our cause, and unite with us in faith and spirit to labor for the Lord, asking only simple food and clothing. He is a good mechanic and experienced farmer, and his whole soul is engaged in planting and building up the desolate wastes, to the glory of the Lord, for the aid and refuge of Israel.

The Austrian and French steamers come to Jaffa every two weeks, and from our terraces we see them come and go beyond the forest of palm, orange, and banana trees, that intervene between our house and the sea, but they seldom bring any news from our far-off native land.

A few weeks since we made a short excursion of an hour and a half north, to visit a beautiful river, some distance above its entrance into the sea. There are two very ancient stone mills, with eleven set of stones, carried round at a rapid rate, day and night, by clumsy machinery. The river contains about the same volume of water as the Schuylkill, though narrower; the soil on each side is very rich, and almost of a black color. We saw several plantations of mulberry trees and cotton irrigated by raising water from the river.

Excuse the haste of this letter, as I received yours last evening, and wish the steamer that leaves to day to take this—rather than wait another two weeks before sending an answer. I have, my dear son, endeavored to represent our present state to you. While the opportunity for usefulness is very great, it needs much self-denial, industry, and patience, as we live in a very frugal manner, and have constant labor and care, with no certain support but faith in the same kind Providence that has thus far led and upheld us in this our sincere purpose to only do his will.

Your ever-devoted and sincere mother,
C. S. MINOR.

METHODIST TRACT OPERATIONS.—A year ago, the Methodists organized a Tract Society, to take charge of that class of publications. Last week the first annual meeting was held, at which a very favorable report was presented. The Society has 36 conference auxiliaries, including the German conference at Bremen; 13 conference agents, whose business it is to travel extensively throughout the bounds of the conference where they severally belong, appoint colporteurs, and look after the general interests of the tract cause. There are 76 colporteurs employed. The Society's list of tracts already amounts to 554, including those in the German tongue. The number of pages of unbound tracts distributed during the year amount to 5,876, 240; and of bound tracts there have been sold 101,780 volumes. The receipts for the year amount to $16,400.

EVADING THE LIQUOR LICENSE LAW—Peter Buckley, of Delaware City, Del., has been convicted on four counts, and fined $104, for selling liquor without license. It appears he attempted to evade the law by selling a cracker or cigar for a fip, and then asking the purchaser to take a drink. He proved the sale of a cracker in one instance, and a cigar in another, and contended that he had the right to give away his liquor to his customer. But it was proven that the purchasers went to the house to get the liquor, and that the crackers would not have offered sufficient inducement to call them there, had the liquor not been in anticipation. The Court held that it was an attempt to evade the meaning and spirit of the law.

HOT CORN: LIFE SCENES IN NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED. By Solon Robinson. Published by Dewitt & Davenport, 160 and 162 Nassau-st. N. Y. Pp. 408, $1 25 elegantly bound and gilt.

In this work the author has connected by a slight thread of narrative numerous sketches which have appeared from time to time in the Daily Tribune. The pictures which he gives of every-day life in New York are true and graphic, and can not be looked upon without profit. The volume sustains to the Temperance cause a relation similar in some respects to that of Uncle Tom's Cabin to the Anti-Slavery cause. A wide circulation is inevitable.

THE HUTCHINSON FAMILY have been giving concerts in New York for several weeks past, which are largely attended by delighted audiences. This is their twelfth year in New York; and although they have given over one hundred concerts in the city, the desire to hear them seems unabated. They sing at the Tabernacle on Thursday evening, Dec. 22d, and on three successive Wednesday evenings, January 4th, 11th, and 18th, 1854.

The Clergy and the Liquor Law.—The State Temperance Society of Massachusetts recently addressed a circular to all the clergymen in that State, asking them this question:—"Are you in favor of the Prohibitory principle and main features of the Anti-Liquor Law of Massachusetts?" To this question, responses have been received from five hundred and forty-four clergymen—which must be a large majority of the Protestant ministers in the State—of whom five hundred and thirty-seven say Yes, and seven only answer No—as follows:—

Street Preaching in New York.—On Sunday, Dec. 11th, a Mr. Parsons, undertaking to preach in the open air at the foot of Third-st., in New York, was arrested by a policeman, acting under an order from the Mayor. A large concourse of people had assembled to hear the preacher, and many of them were indignant at the arrest, and some went so far as to urge a rescue of the prisoner. The matter was compromised, however, by sending for Justice Wood, who, after an informal examination, released Mr. Parsons, the Mayor being present and concurring, when the crowd dispersed. This matter was much talked of during last week, and fears were expressed that a riot would follow if Mr. Parsons should attempt to preach on Sunday, Dec. 18th. The Mayor issued a proclamation warning the people to be on their guard, and Bishop Hughes, through the daily papers, advised all good Catholics to keep away. The result was, that although Mr. Parsons preached, every thing passed off quietly.

Religious Books in Hayti.—An exchange says that one of the missionaries of the New York City Tract Society having supplied the crew of a vessel going to Hayti, not only with tracts, but also with some religious papers and books, the men, upon their arrival there, made them into a parcel, and were taking them on shore, when they were stopped by a Custom-House Officer. This being observed by a superior officer, he directed that no duty should be charged upon the parcel, and promised the Captain, that whatever he might bring of the same kind should be passed duty free. Just at that time, the Emperor Faustin passed that way, and hearing of what had taken place, he immediately gave command that henceforward no duty should be charged upon Bibles, Testaments, or Protestant religious books or tracts, or other publications; and then, turning to the Captain, he said, "I shall be happy to have on the Island as much of such reading matter as you can bring, and if any person interferes with you, let me know it."

European News.

We have European dates to Dec. 3d. The most important items of news will be found below.

There has been no more fighting on the Danube; but the Turks have gained considerable advantage in Asia in the capture of the important fortress Sochou Kaleh, on the north-west of the Black Sea, commanding an important route leading to the Caucasus. The Turks have also gained advantages at sea, having sunk one Russian war-steamer and captured another. There is reason to believe that a new diplomatic conference has been resolved upon by the Four Western Powers, with a view to the peaceable settlement of the Eastern Question.

From England there is very little news of importance.

The "Protestant Alliance" held a meeting at London on the 29th ult., to memorialize the Government against the aspect of Popery toward British Protestants abroad. The Earl of Shaftesbury was in the Chair. Lord Shaftesbury also presided, on the 28th, at a meeting of the London Missionary Society, to send additional missionaries to China.

Cholera has appeared in the City of Cork. Dublin is, as yet, free from the disease.

Cholera is making some progress in Paris. Fifteen cases per day are now reported.

Statements had been current of the outbreak of a Miguelite revolt in Portugal. The news came to England in a letter from Madrid of date November 24, stating that Don Miguel had been proclaimed in Oporto. The Clamor Publico had a letter from Badajoz, November 21, which mentions that the Thirteenth Regiment of Infantry had risen in insurrection in the direction of the Douro, and that many Miguelites had joined its ranks.

The Mercantile Library Association have applied to Thomas Carlyle to come to this City and deliver a Course of Lectures.

Conflagration in Minnesota.—The St. Paul Democrat has been favored with the perusal of a letter from Selkirk settlement on Red river, dated 3d inst., by which it learns that a terrible and destructive fire swept over that settlement on the 30th and 31st ult., devouring everything in its course, and spreading terror and consternation through the community. The fire commenced at Fiddler's Point, on the Assineboin, on the 30th October. The weather had been unusually dry for several weeks, and a strong south wind drove the flames with a maddened fury down behind the settlement toward Oak Hammock. About 12 oclock at night, a furious gale set in from the north-west, and the fire, like a crazy demon, flew before it, bearing death and devastation in its trail. Several citizens had been severely or fatally burnt, several thousand tons of hay destroyed, and an immense number of horses killed. At Oak Hammond twenty-seven horses were dstroyed in one band.

A Mrs. Williams, who eloped from Columbus, Ohio, with a man named Griffith, was arrested in Cincinnati some days since, and sent back to her husband. Since then she has murdered her husband by giving him poison, at the instigation of Griffith. She and her paramour are now in jail to await a trial.

SUMMARY.

The Great Western Railroad from the Niagara River to London, Canada, is now in operation. It was opened to Hamilton, fifty miles, a few weeks since. On the 13th inst., the first train of cars passed over the road from Hamilton to London, distance 84 miles; the train was four hours in performing the trip, having to make frequent stoppages to receive the congratulations of the assembled crowd. A part of the distance was run at the rate of fifty miles an hour. On the 1st January the Road will be opened through from Niagara Falls to opposite Detroit, forming, in connection with the Michigan Central Road, another through line from New York to Chicago.

Gertrude Kohler has been committed to the Albany jail for indulging in the luxury of three "live lords." To the first she was married five years ago, to the second two years ago, and to the third quite recently. They all met a few days since at Albany, where they agreed to decide their respective claims to the fair dame by a three-handed game of "seven up." The first husband won, but Gertrude refused to abide the hazard of the cards, and clung to her latest acquisition, whereupon recourse was had to the law, and she was taken before the Police Court for bigamy.

There is a bill before the Legislature of Georgia, proposing that the property of the wife at the time of marriage shall not vest in the husband, and that all property she may subsequently acquire, by grant or devise, shall absolutely vest in herself and heirs. The husband is to be an ex-officio Trustee of the wife's estate, subject to removal by the judgment of a Court of Equity. He is also empowered to expend the rents, issues and profits of the wife's separate estate for family uses.

A dispatch dated Washington, Wednesday, Dec. 14, 1853, says: I have trustworthy information from New Orleans to the effect that a powerful fillibuster expedition is preparing against Cuba, and will sail some time before the middle of February. It is intended that the entire force shall consist of some four thousand men, led by officers of tried skill and bravery, with a general who gained laurels in Mexico at their head. The enlistments are proceeding with every effort to keep the matter strictly private.

The Gloucester fishermen have all arrived home. Of the whole fleet of 250 sail, only three have been lost, and the crews of these were saved. Many of the vessels have returned home with not half fish enough to pay their bills, but some have made splendid voyages, stocking about $7,000 each. A large number of new vessels will be added to the fleet next year.

During the scene, a little infant daughter was added to the family.

A telegraphic dispatch to Walter R. Jones, Esq., dated at Halifax, Nov. 15th, says that the Humboldt is all broken to pieces, and nothing more from her can be saved except on salvage. Very little of the materials will be saved. The Government has sent down a revenue cutter to protect the floating property. About half the cargo is landed, nearly all thoroughly damaged.

The Cincinnati, Peru and Chicago Railroad Company, organized under the general law of Indiana, is building a railroad from Laporte to Peru, a distance of sixty-nine miles. J., Court has decided between a Mr. Lewis and a Mr. Pitcher, on a suit for trespass for a disputed tract of land, about three feet broad at one end, and running to a point at the other, the value of which was estimated at from one shilling to fifty dollars. The Jury found the defendant guilty of trespass to the amount of $200 and costs.

In Florida, Louisiana and Texas, the only States where sugar is made from the cane, a capital of $80,000,000 is invested in the business. These States produce annually above 300,000 hogsheads of the article. The importation of foreign sugar amounts to 350,000 hogsheads, more or less.

Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt appeared in a concert at Dresden, on the 26th ult., for the first time since many months. One of her pieces, the Cradle Song of Tauber, was encored. The critic of the National Zeitung says that her voice has lost much, especially in the middle notes, and is no longer what it once was.

The trial of Tucker, the Engineer of the New Haven train at the time of the accident at Norwalk bridge, has been postponed still further, on account of his continued illness. He has not been well since the accident.

The interior of Australia, a barren sandy desert, has been found to be considerably below the level of the sea. It is now proposed to employ British convicts in cutting a narrow canal from the ocean to the desert, a distance of about 250 miles, when it is expected that the rush of water will be so great as to widen the canal and cause the formation of an inland sea almost as large as the Mediterranean, to the incalculable benefit of a vast extent of territory at present wholly useless.

Ozone, which is sometimes, but not universally, present in the atmosphere, and which has been hitherto regarded when observed to be an allotropic condition of oxygen, has been discovered, by a German chemist at Bonn, not to be so, but a distinct substance, existing as a teroxide of hydrogen, thus continuing the series of the compounds of oxygen with hydrogen. The details of the process by means of which the discovery was effected have not yet been given.

The Postmaster at Cincinnati has detected an ingenious attempt at fraud. What appeared to be a large pamphlet, the leaves protruding at the ends of the envelop, was received at the office. On removing the envelop the center of the book between the covers was found to have been cut away, and five dozen of silk gloves and four dozen packages of needles packed nicely in the space.

The Wheeling Intelligencer says that twenty-five years ago the father of M. P. Ward, who killed Prof. Butler, of Louisville, was with difficulty restrained from attacking a teacher who had moderately chastised his son. The son is now a confined criminal, charged with killing the teacher of his youngest brother. It seems that he is twenty-five years of age, and married. Verily the influence of a good or bad example reaches far, far into the future.

The large new public house, at Fairfield, Conn., known as the "Marine Hotel," belonging to Mr. John B. Monnet of the New York Hotel, was entirely destroyed by fire last week. Part of the furniture was saved. The house was closed for the season since last Sept., and the fire was doubtless the work of an incendiary. The building and furniture were insured for $35,000.

We learn by telegraph from New Orleans, that information has been received there that Santa Anna had been declared Dictator for ten years. Another account states that he is to be proclaimed Emperor. It is likely that he has already assumed, as he has for some time exercised, supreme power, and that these reports are founded on this fact.

A fire, attended with a serious loss of life, occurred recently in Woodstock, Canada. The family consisted of six persons, two of which escaped the flames by jumping from the windows. The other four seem to have been unaware of their danger in time to make their escape. An elderly lady, two children and a servant, perished in the flames.

A robber in a hotel in Halifax, the other day, was found kneeling at a trunk in the room of a boarder, and on being discovered said he was at his prayers, and begged not to be interrupted. He was politely left to finish his devotions and decamp with his booty.

MARRIED.

At Hopkinton, R. I., on the 19th Nov., by Eld. Joel Greene, Mr. BENJAMIN KENYON to Miss PHEBE E. CRANDALL, all of the above place.

In Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., Nov. 24th, by Eld. L. M. Cottrell, Mr. LEROY BURDICK to Miss MARIETTE GREENE, both of Persia.

DIED.

In Whitestown, Oneida Co., N. Y., Dec. 10, 1853, of paralysis, REUBEN WILCOX, in the 92d year of his age. Mr. Wilcox was born at Middletown, Ct., in 1762. During the Revolutionary War, he was called into service a short time, for which he received a pension. In 1792 he removed from Middletown to Whitestown, N.Y. Passing through the present city of Utica, which had then only one framed house, he found his way by the aid of marked trees to the place where he spent the last sixty-one years of his life, and where he died. As a religious man, Mr. Wilcox was distinguished for conscientiousness and tenacity of what he considered to be Bible truth. During a revival among the Congregationalists at Middletown, in 1779, he became a subject of Divine Grace, though he did not at that time make a public profession of religion. Soon after his removal to Whitestown, he became a Baptist in principle, and a few years later a Sabbath-keeper. About thirty years ago he was baptized and joined the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield of which he remained a member until his death. He received baptism at the hands of Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, by whom his funeral sermon was preached.

October 20th, of croup, at the residence of his grandfather, Eld. C. Chester, in Verona, N. Y., while on a visit with his parents, ALFRED STILLMAN, son of John H. and Sarah E. Chester, aged 2 years and 4 months.

In Rome, N. Y., November 28th, of consumption, Mr. ROBERT CLARKE, aged 54 years. During his last sickness he obtained a hope in Christ. He has left a widow and three children to mourn their loss. C. C.

Railway Bridge at Niagara.

This great work, which is to unite the United States with Canada by a railway, is rapidly advancing under the supervision of Mr. John A. Roebling, an engineer favorably known in connection with the suspension acqueduct on the Pennsylvania canal at Pittsburgh, and a suspension bridge over the Monongahela, near the same place. As it is to be on some accounts one of the most remarkable mechanical achievements in the world, we shall be pardoned for devoting considerable space to a careful description of its plan and prospects. It is well known that Stephenson, the Magnus Apollo in engineering, whose fame rests upon his Tubular Bridge over Menai Straits, has decided against the suspension principle as applied to railway bridges, mainly on the ground that it is incapable of rendering them sufficiently stiff. The successful construction of this work, therefore, at Niagara, will make an era in bridge building. It will be doing what has not merely never been done before, but what has been pronounced by the highest authority impracticable.

The present suspension bridge having been constructed in 1847 to aid in the erection of the railway bridge, will be removed after performing that service. It was begun by a boy on the Canada shore, who elevated a kite, and by that means established a thread communication with the other side. Over this tow-path wire was drawn, and the wire cables were soon formed. The railway bridge will consist of two parts, each suspended from two cables; a covered one for common travel, and above that, on its roof, an open track for the railroad. It was first intended to build a bridge with a single floor, but the difficulty of rendering it wide enough for purposes of horse, foot and steam locomotion at the same time, without making it too heavy and too expensive, caused the plan to be abandoned. The double floor of this bridge simplifies the problem of rendering a stiff support to the weight of a railroad train, by placing under it, in addition to other props, the tresses that will form the sides of the lower portion of the bridge. The hollow tube, also, which that part will form, is expected to aid materially in strengthening the work, operating like the tube in Stephenson's bridges.

The bridge will be 800 feet long, hung by wire ropes, five feet apart, to four huge wire cables stretching from shore to shore, with a considerable deflection, over the tops of towers 60 feet high. The towers are now advanced toward completion, having been begun some four or five months since. They are fifteen feet square at the base and 8 feet square at the top, built of a dark-colored limestone, very hard and compact. But the first operation, which was commenced last winter, was to sink eight shafts, 25 feet deep, in the rock below the towers, four on each side of the river. In the bottom of each of these, enlarged for the purpose, a cast-iron plate, six feet square, was placed, to which an immense chain was fastened. The shaft was then filled in with masonry, the chain being imbedded in a mixture of cement, lime and sand. These chains reach the surface, outside the base of the towers, and are to connect with the cables. They will be 66 feet long, each consisting of eight links, that average over eight feet in length. The links are made alternately of seven and eight plates of wrought iron, each plate formed into one piece without a weld. Each link of eight plates has sandwiched in, to use an expressive phrase, the plates of the sevenfold link, and the whole fifteen are riveted firmly together by an iron bolt, $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter. The anchor plate at the bottom of the shaft cannot be lifted until the whole rock is raised bodily, with all its incumbent masonry. Nor can the plates and chains give way from any force which can be withstood by the cables, and they are calculated to withstand a pressure four times greater than the whole weight of the superstructure, combined with any load that will ever be placed upon it. The towers, it will be observed, act as fulcrums, between the chains on the one side and the cables on the other, and the weight of a loaded bridge will not act upon them sideways, but vertically.

The cables are to be $9\frac{1}{4}$ inches in diameter, each formed of 3,390 strands of wire. Long lines of wire are first formed, by fitting the ends of separate pieces to one another, and wrapping them round with smaller wire. These are then dipped in boiling oil and dried, and the process is repeated a number of times, until a coating is formed that will protect the metal thoroughly from the moisture. The wire is then wound round large cylinders. These operations are now going on upon the Canada shore. When the cable comes to be formed, the wire will be drawn over to the American side, one strand at a time, passed through the link of a chain, then drawn back to the other side, passed through a chain there, and so on, back and forth, until the whole cable is made up; this will then be tightly wound round with small wire. The cables will connect with the chains, after passing through the iron saddles on the top of the towers, there being iron blocks with a groove fitted to the cable. Each saddle rests upon a wrought iron roller, three inches in diameter, that rolls on a smooth iron plate. This is to accommodate any slight motion that may arise from unequal tension between the chains and cables, when the balance is from any cause disturbed.

Stephenson's great objection to the suspension principle, as was stated above, was the want of stiffness. It is conceded by the engineer of this bridge, in his report on the subject, that wire cables alone will not be sufficient. But he relies for stiffness, first, on the timber placed under the railway. Two girders, as they are called, or longitudinal timbers, four feet deep, are to be placed in the upper floor, for the immediate support of the track. In addition to these, are the trusses or sides of the lower bridge, which will consist of upright posts, five feet apart, supporting the upper floor, and connected with one another by a light bridging and by iron rods. Any pressure upon either floor is thus shared with the other. The rods are to be one inch in diameter and $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 feet long, and will connect the posts by fives crossing at right angles, between the top and bottom of the first and fifth. The vertical action of each post is by these means transferred to each of those with which it is connected. The rods will have a nut at each end, which will be screwed up tight to the post, so that these rods will make the trussing extremely rigid. Besides these two sources of stiffness, stays will be made use of, that is, iron rods reaching out from the towers to the bridges at different angles, like those sometimes employed to sustain a long and heavy gate. These three resources, it is believed, will supply to the bridge all needed stiffness.

The action of the wind will not be very great, the trussing of the lower bridge being quite open, and allowing it pretty free passage. The width of the lower part will be nineteen feet clear, of the upper twenty-four feet, the latter being elevated twenty feet above the other floor, and 230 feet above the water. As to the capacity of the bridge—supposing it covered from end to end with a loaded train, the weight of such a train is estimated at 430 tons, which, added to the weight of the bridge, 782 tons, with fifteen per cent. on the weight of the train, as the result of a speed of five miles an hour, viz: sixty-one tons, make 1,273 tons. The tension of the cables resulting from this and their average deflection, is equal to 2,240 tons. Their capacity is 10,000, or more than four times the tension. The tension referred to, it will be observed, is an extraordinary one, as it can scarcely be supposed that a loaded train equal in length to that of the bridge, will ever be allowed upon it. Assuming as the engineer does, 2,000 tons as a tension to which the cables may more frequently be subjected, he has provided a resistance equal to five times that. The covered floor, were it crowded to its utmost capacity, might hold 310 tons. But as this might be closed in case of a very heavy train approaching, before it was allowed to come upon the bridge, it is not necessary to make a calculation for an extreme load upon both parts at once.

The suspension bridge at Lewistown is 1040 feet in length, the largest in the world. This will be 240 feet shorter, but a far more surprising work. It is to be done next June. Its cost was estimated at $250,000, but it is likely, we are told, to exceed that sum. Supposing it is twice as much, what a saving even then, in comparison with the immense expenditure to which Stephenson has subjected the English at Menai Straits and Montreal. The tubular bridge at Montreal is not yet done or paid for to be sure, but its cost is estimated at $7,000,000. [N. Y. Evening Post.

Heroes and Martyrs.

Our readers will probably all recollect the story of the Norwegian boy at Chicago, who was drowned by some older boys because he refused to assist them in robbing an orchard. Some of the papers now raise doubts as to the martyrdom of the boy, and attempt to account for his death in some other way than that first suggested. It seems to such that heroism, of the kind imputed to the boy, does not exist in the world at the present time. Such editors underrate humanity. A case of moral heroism exceeding that imputed to Knud Iverson, occurred in Marquette County, in this State, a little over a year ago, the facts of which were established by judicial investigation, and were related to us by Judge Larrabee, who presided at the trial.

A beautiful, fair-haired, blue-eyed boy, about nine years of age, was taken from the Orphan Asylum in Milwaukie and adopted by a respectable farmer of Marquette, a professor of religion and a member of the Baptist persuasion. A girl, a little older than the boy, was also adopted into the same family. Soon after these children were installed in their new home, the boy discovered criminal conduct on the part of his new mother, which he mentioned to the little girl, and it thereby came to the ears of the woman; she indignantly denied the story to the satisfaction of her husband, and insisted that the boy should be whipped until he confessed the falsehood. The man—poor, weak bigot—impelled by a sense of religious duty, proceeded to the task assigned him, by procuring a bundle of rods, stripping the child naked, and suspending him by a cord to the rafters of the house, and whipping him at intervals for over two hours, till the blood ran through the floor, making a pool upon the floor below; stopping only to rest and interrogate the boy, and getting no other reply than "Pa, I told the truth—I cannot tell a lie;" the woman all the time urging him to "do his duty." The poor little hero, at length released from his torture, threw his arms around the neck of his tormentor, kissed him, and said, "Pa, I am so cold," and died. It appeared in evidence, upon the trial of this man and woman for murder, that the child did tell the truth, and suffered death by slow torture rather than tell a lie. The age of heroism and martyrdom will not have passed till mothers cease to instil holy precepts into the minds of their infant offspring. The man and woman who murdered this angel child are now in the penitentiary at Waupun, to which they were sentenced for ten years. [Madison (Wis.) Argus.

Analysis of Soils.

Within a few years, an expectation has prevailed that, by means of chemical analysis, the exact composition of soils could be ascertained, and thence we should learn what special application each soil might need to make it fertile. It is obvious, that if this result were attainable, agriculture would become of the nature of an exact science; and, as might be expected, the general interest and great importance of these researches have attracted the public attention to them. The agricultural journals give notices of chemists who analize soils for farmers, and give advice, founded on the analysis, for the application of manures. On the other hand, we have seen published the opinions of men of science to the effect that such analysis, in the present state of chemistry, does not lead to useful results. In the address of Professor Hallowell, of Alexandria, to the Agricultural Society of London, Virginia, recently published, he expresses the opinion that the analysis of the soil is "wholly useless for practical purposes." His remarks on the subject are as follows:

I have been requested to state my opinion of the advantage of analyzing soils with the view of determining what manures to apply for their improvement; and I do so with pleasure, having had some experience in the practical part of the subject. The present state of chemical science is such as to enable the chemist to determine, with the utmost precision, the constituents of a body subjected to his examination; but a difficulty lies in getting a fair specimen of the soil to operate upon. The quantity usually taken to analyze is from fifty to one hundred grains, say half a teaspoonful; and how is so small a quantity to be obtained that shall be an exact sample of the field? If it should not be an exact sample, and it appears almost impossible it ever should be, then the result will necessarily mislead, and is wholly useless for practical purposes. On this account I place comparatively little reliance upon any benefits likely to arise from a general analysis of soils; though such an analysis may sometimes be very beneficial in determining the presence of some hurtful ingredient that may be diffused through the soil, and which may be neutralized by some substance readily determined and applied. I would rely much more on a knowledge of the constituents of the rocks from which the soil has resulted, and the mode of cropping and culture to which the lands have been subjected; and thus, knowing what they originally contained, and what has been removed from them, we can readily infer what is left. If the money paid for analyzing a soil, as a general thing, were spent in the purchase of some guano, crushed bones, ashes, or lime, with which to experiment on different crops, on a small scale, it would be likely to lead to much more satisfactory and profitable results."

Parental and Filial.

Two family incidents show great results from little causes. Baron Cuvier, when a very little boy, was encouraged by his mother in collecting and delineating objects of nature—the study of minerals, plants, &c., aided by drawing. During the researches made by this great man, he often referred to this maternal incident as one of the happiest circumstances of his life, furnishing good reasons that the vast services rendered to science and to the world by this great naturalist and good man, are to be traced to the judicious treatment of one mother to a little son.

About twenty years since a little boy in Western New York entered with great energy into the collection of minerals and other objects of nature. His parents soon coming to the conclusion that it was not safe to repress this spirit and his efforts, allotted to him a room and shelves for storing and arranging his collections, and by various modes encouraged this young explorer of nature's riches. His ardor and intelligence pointed him out, at the early age of sixteen, for an assistant engineer on an important railroad route. For his skill, energy, and fidelity in the work assigned him in this responsible undertaking, he was, in a short time, selected as the principal, for surveying one branch of the general route. At the age of seventeen he was employed as an assistant geologist for the State of New York. When that great work was completed, he was elected to a professor's chair in a very extensive female seminary in Albany. After holding the chair for several years, he resigned it to visit Germany, where he spent two years with Liebig, renowned for his researches and discoveries in animal and vegetable chemistry. On his return from Europe, he was elected to a professor's chair in the Lawrence School of Science, in Cambridge, Mass. He now holds, at the age of thirty-two, this important place in an institution designed to advance, in scientific investigations, the graduates of colleges and universities. He is professor Horsford, son of Hon. Jeremiah Horsford, now of the New York delegation in Congress. It adds to the credit of this young and promising professor, that during his whole course, his support came from his own efforts.

The Vatican.

This word is often used, but there are many who do not understand its import. The term refers to a collection of buildings on one of the seven hills of Rome, which covers a space of 1,200 feet in length, and 1,000 in breadth. It is built on the spot once occupied by the garden of the cruel Nero. It owes its origin to the Bishop of Rome, who, in the early part of the sixth century, erected an humble residence on its site. About the year 1160, Pope Eugenius rebuilt it on a magnificent scale. Innocent II. a few years afterwards gave it up as a lodging place to Peter II. King of Arragon. In 1305, Clement V. at the instigation of the King of France, removed the Papal See from Rome to Avignon, when the Vatican remained in a condition of obscurity and neglect for more than seventy years. But soon after the return of the pontifical court to Rome, an event which had been so earnestly prayed for by a poor Petrarch, and which finally took place in 1376, the Vatican was put into a state of repair, enlarged, and it was thenceforward considered as the regular palace and residence of the Popes, who, one after the other, added fresh buildings to it, and gradually encircled it with antiquities, statues, pictures and books, until it became the richest depository in the world. The library of the Vatican was commenced fourteen hundred years ago. It contains 40,000 manuscripts, among which are some by Pliny, St. Thomas, St. Charles Boromeo, and many Hebrew, Syrian, Arabian, and Armenian Bibles. The whole of the immense buildings composing the Vatican are filled with statues found beneath the ruins of ancient Rome; with paintings by the master; and with curious medals and antiquities of almost every description. When it is known that there have been exhumed more than 70,000 statues, from the ruined temples and palaces of Rome, the reader can form some idea of the richness of the Vatican. It will ever be held in veneration, by the student, the artist, and the scholar. Raphael and Michael Angelo are enthroned there, and their thrones will be endurable as the love of beauty and genius in the hearts of their worshipers.

The Cripple's Farm.

At the mass-meeting of farmers, in Concord, Mass., in March last, Hon. John W. Proctor gave as an illustration of what energy and perseverance can do, under the most discouraging and unfavorable circumstances, for improving, at one and the same time, the soil and the mind.

"A few years since," said Mr. Proctor, "Simeon L. Wilson, of Methuen, sent in his statement to the committee on farms, of the Essex Society, which, when the facts came to be known, awakened much interest. It appeared that this cultivator of the soil had been a cripple from his youth, with no command of his lower extremities whatever, and only able to move from place to place, as moved by others, or in the little go-gig that his ingenuity had constructed. He had come in possession of about an acre of what was deemed a worthless bog, situated by the side of the way, for years claimed by no one—and had contrived to drain it, and to cover it from the adjoining knolls, so that he grew thereon a nursery of more than twelve thousand fruit trees, and a variety of fruit of fine quality in considerable abundance. In fact, he so managed as to be able to sell enough to support himself and his mother from the products of this reclaimed acre, thereby saving the town one hundred dollars a year, to which they would otherwise have been properly subjected."

What a lesson for those stalwart farmers, with great farms, and healthy sons, to study and put to practice, in reclaiming their wet lands and irrigating the dry ones upon their farms! "A word to the wise is sufficient."

Woman's Rights Questions.

A Convention was recently held at Rochester, to consider the following questions, which we suppose are leading ones in the creed of those technically called Woman's Rights People:—

1. Why should not Woman's work be paid for according to the quality of the work done, and not the sex of the worker?

2. How shall we open for Woman's energies new spheres of well-remunerated industry?

3. Why should not Wives, equally with Husbands, be entitled to their own earnings?

4. Why should not Widows, equally with Widowers, become by law the legal Guardians, as they certainly are by nature the natural Guardians, of their own children?

5. On what just ground do the laws make a distinction between Men and Women, in regard to the ownership of property, inheritance, and the administration of estates?

6. Why should Women, any more than Men, be taxed without representation?

7. Why may not Women claim to be tried by a jury of their peers with exactly the same right as Men claim to be and actually are?

8. If Women need the protection of the laws, and are subject to the penalties of the laws, equally with Men, why should they not have an equal influence in making the laws, and appointing Legislatures, the Judiciary and Executive?

And finally, if Governments—according to our National Declaration of Independence—"derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," why should Women, any more than Men, be governed without their own consent; and why, therefore, is not Woman's right to Suffrage precisely equal to Man's.

The Sandwich Islands.

As the question of annexing the group of islands composing the Hawaiian kingdom is becoming to assume considerable importance, it is proper that the people should be put in possession of all the information in regard to the subject which can be obtained.

The Hawaiian kingdom is composed of a group of islands, seven in number, situated in latitude from 19 to 22 degrees north, and on a direct line between San Francisco and Hong Kong, 2,260 miles from the former, and 5,000 miles from the latter. Their position is an important one in a commercial point of view, affording a good recruiting station for our fleets of whaling ships in the Arctic and Pacific, and their convenient distance from California would make them desirable as a depot for ocean mail steamers between California and China. They are important also as a military and naval station for the protection of our commerce in the North Pacific.

The native population of the islands is about 60,000, distributed among the different islands as follows:—Hawaii, 20,000; Ohau, 18,000; Niani, 13,000; Kania, 5,000; Molokai, 2,500; Niihau, 700; Lanai, 300.

This part of the population, however, is rapidly decreasing, and in a quarter of a century, they will probably have entirely passed away. All the leading interests of the kingdom are in the hands of the Americans now. The rich planters and merchants are Americans; the missionaries who have done so much in bringing them from a state of rude barbarism, and christianizing and civilizing them, are a large majority Americans. The members of the King's ministry are Americans, and nearly all the important offices are in the hands of Americans. American sentiments, feelings, laws, and institutions, must follow as a natural consequence.

Huahine.

The schooner Emma Packer, Captain Latham, lately arrived from Huahine, one of the Society Islands, after a passage of 37 days, bringing many interesting particulars of this distant, but important group.

Huahine is in lon. 151 deg. 8. min. E., and lat. 16 deg. 43. min. S., and is consequently distant 3,764 miles from San Francisco in a S. E. by S. course. The group, consisting of six islands, was discovered by Cook in 1769, and has until lately been under the influence of the English missionaries; but the policy of the French Government to extend its foreign possessions, has led them to usurp and claim the principal island, (Tahiti,) where they are now forming a naval rendezvous.

A description of one island would answer for any of the others. Huahine is about forty miles each way and its coast is indented with numerous small harbors, receiving the waters of several small streams—almost rivers. The principal of these, and the most secure for shipping, is that called Owherre Bay, where the Emma Packer received her cargo. The Islanders, in number some 800, have several little settlements on the coast, but the principal one is at the Bay above mentioned. The interior abounds in beautiful valleys, exquisite spots of woodland, waving with all the luxuriant verdure of the tropics, and smiled upon by a perpetual summer. The gentle S. W. trades preserve a delicious coolness, and in this, as in all the Polynesian Islands, there seems but to want the benefits of a constant communication with the civilized world to make it a most delightful residence. The hills and rising grounds present the most enticing picture of rural beauty, their sides covered with a never-dying expanse of rich green grass and bright-leaved trees. The numerous valleys bordering the tiny streams afford excellent pasturing to the small stock of cows and horses which have been imported from Australia. The island produces, in the greatest luxuriance, oranges, lemons, yams, breadfruit, bannanas, limes and sweet potatoes, and the natives subsist upon those during the greater part of the year. The bays afford a variety of delicious fish.

THE ANCIENT LEVITICAL CITIES.—The Rev. Dr. Croly, the well-known author, recently writing on the subject of a park projected for Finsbury, one of the London Boroughs, points out as remarkable, "that in the divine allotment of the cities of Israel, this provision was distinctly made, in the forty-eight cities of the Levites, of a circle of open ground surrounding each city of a thousand cubits breadth, probably for gardens and fruits, and an exterior circle of two thousand cubits more, called the 'fields of the suburbs,' for pasture, and, of course, recreation, both forming a large space, which was expressly forbidden to be encroached on in any sale of dwellings or alienation of property. 'That the fields of the suburbs of their cities may not be sold, for it is their perpetual possession.' (Leviticus 25: 34.) We are to remember, also, that this special provision for health was made in the midst of a nation almost wholly agricultural, already 'sitting under its vine and fig-tree, and singularly exempted from those drudgeries which in later times shut up men in infected air, and mulct generations of half the life of man."

Cure for the Potato Rot.

In a recent conversation with Mr. John Barret, Jr., of Cayuga Bridge, on the subject of the potato disease, he informed us that he had not been troubled with the rot for many years, and that there was an easy remedy for it which all might apply with very little trouble or expense.

Mr. Barret stated that a few years since, he, as well as most of his neighbors, lost their entire crop of potatoes by the rot—that the next spring he was compelled to go to another town for seed, where he procured a supply for himself and an adjoining neighbor, and where he was told how to prevent the disease. He said he and his neighbor planted the seed he procured on adjoining fields—the soil and treatment similar—only, that Mr. B. applied the remedy recommended to him—which consisted in sowing ashes over the field once a week for six weeks, commencing shortly after the second hoeing of the crop. He used from two to three bushels of ashes per acre, which is sufficient to give the potato-tops a good dusting. The result was, that his field was entirely free from the disease, while the potatoes on the adjoining field, without this application of ashes, rotted badly. Since then Mr. B., as well as most of his neighbors, had applied ashes, and had been entirely free from the disease.

Potato Harvester.

Three patents for machines to dig potatoes have been granted. The first of these consists of an axle and pair of wheels, drawn by a pair of horses, and around said axle, which moves with the wheels, a drum or cylinder is arranged, and armed with rows of radial teeth, while immediately behind and beneath, and in the same curve with the periphery of the said radial teeth on said drum, is arranged a fixed rake, which has the ends of its curved teeth at the lowest part of the machine, while its rear part and head extend upward and backward in the curve of said drum to the highest part of the machine. As the machine is drawn forward astride the row of potatoes to be dug, the rake teeth of the fixed rake run into or under the hills of potatoes, while the radial teeth on the drum sweep backward along the potatoes toward the curved teeth, and as the dirt falls out the potatoes are carried rearward and upward between the drum teeth and the curved rake head, and when at the top of the drum they roll off into the cart body.

A second machine of this character has also been patented, substituting for the radial teeth on the drum a series of stiff brushes, and for the upper portion of the curved rake head, in the rear of the drum, an endless belt of open-work slats, or their equivalent, for the purpose of allowing the dirt to fall out, and to carry up the potatoes and deliver them into the cart body.

A NOVEL GIFT.—The Gazette des Hospiteaux, one of the oldest medical journals in France, has just received a donation of 10,000f. a year, from a physician attached to one of the hospitals in Paris, on condition—1. That the donor's name shall be kept inviolably secret; 2. That 3,000f. of the sum shall be employed in encouraging the authors of useful and practical papers published in the Gazette; and 3. That the remaining 7,000f. shall be employed in distributing copies of the Gazette to physicians or students who are too poor to pay the whole or any part of the subscription—the simple declaration to that effect, of the applicants, being all that is to be required. This is probably the first time, in the history of the periodical press, that a journal has been the object of such munificence.

DURABILITY OF WOOD.—The piles under the London Bridge have been driven 500 years, and on examining them in 1846 they were found to be little decayed. Old Savoy Place, in the city of London, was built 650 years ago, and the wooden piles, consisting of oak, elm, beach and chesnut, were found, upon recent examination, to be perfectly sound. Of the durability of timber in a wet state, the piles of a bridge built by the Emperor Trajan over the Danube, afford a striking example. One of these piles was taken up and found to be petrified to the depth of three-fourths of an inch, but the rest of the wood was not different from its former state, though it had been driven 1600 years.

INTERESTING TO LUMBERMEN.—Chief Justice Taney has recently decided in Admiralty, in the United States Circuit Court for the Maryland District, that lumber rafts wrecked on the Susquehannah or any public navigable river, while being floated down or anchored in the river, are not the subject of salvage; that they are not subject to admiralty jurisdiction, as they are not intended for the navigation of the sea or arms of the sea; and that any assistance rendered to such rafts, when in danger of being broken or swept down by the current, is not a salvage service, and makes no liability to a recompense; that all intermeddling with such property in such cases is at the risk of those intermeddling.

Sir George Gore, who arrived at St. Louis some days ago en route to Texas on a hunting excursion, was robbed between Alton and Springfield of his portmanteau, containing a draft for $5,000 on a house in New York, and $300 in gold and jewelry. Sir George telegraphed to New York to stop payment of the draft.

Mr. Alfred E. Beach has commenced a useful monthly paper, called the "People's Journal," an illustrated record of Agriculture, Mechanics, Science and Useful Knowledge, at 50 cents a year, or $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents for a single number. Office at 86 Nassau-street. The first number is an excellent specimen.

A monster tunnel is now in course of construction near Cincinnati, Ohio, on the route of what is called the Short Line Railroad. The tunnel proper will be 8,094 feet in length, or, with its approaches, which are to be arched, 10,011 feet. It will be 20 feet wide and 23 high.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

PERSONAL PERFECTION.

It is only by placing before ourselves the highest standard of excellence, that we may expect to rise even above mediocrity. And though we may be convinced that no real perfection can be attained in this life, yet how glorious the thought, that we possess within us germs of an immortal growth, which, if properly nurtured, will eventually lead us to perfection. As the mirror reflects the image before it, so the heart reflects the character of the ideal it looks upon. Again, the longings of the soul within, are but the indications of its future attainments. Hence how important that our attention be directed to the highest model.

We might more properly denominate our theme Personal Culture, for all individual perfection must be the result of individual culture. And here we find our subject divides itself into three distinct parts—Physical, Mental, and Moral.

To preserve the health of the system is nature's first law. The proper and full development of all the physical functions of our being should be regarded the first and important duty of self-culture—for it is the foundation of all other improvement. As the plant derives its nourishment and vigor from the soil in which it is placed, so the mind derives its strength and means of growth from the body; and if the earth be weak, and destitute of its fertilizing influence, the plant cannot thrive, though the light of heaven may freely shine upon it, and the skies distil in profusion their invigorating dews—so, too, if the body be impaired, deprived of full and perfect development, the mind must ever remain feeble, though bred in the halls of learning, where the Light of Literature may beam upon it, and Science pour forth its unnumbered teachings. The pleasures of sense, the clearness and accuracy of the understanding, and every enjoyment of the soul, depend, first of all, upon the healthy exercise of the physical laws of our nature. Again, in the arrangement of Providence, we are so happily created, that every impression of the mind and heart within, must find its expression in the outward senses. And thus "the eye is the true index of the soul." Every noble impulse throbbing there, every great thought bursting into life, and every clear and brilliant perception of truth, finds its expression in that delicate organ; and if its power of manifestation be weakened by improper use, or by a violation of any of the physical laws, the emotions of the inward man, and the treasures of the mind, lose their greatest means of communication, and in a remarkable degree are as if they did not exist. Again, to what does the Orator owe his influence? All will say, to a great heart; but not altogether; otherwise, Demosthenes would not have made his home in a desolate cave, amid the roaring and confusion of the elements. The mind may conceive the grand thought, and the heart may imbibe it with a holy pathos, yet, were it not for the clarion tones of the speaker, it would fall without impression. If, then, a brilliant eye and a thrilling voice are two important requisites in the attainment of eloquence, and if eloquence be the highest development of our nature, is not attention to health the first grand step of self-culture? It is a deplorable fact, that too many of those who might otherwise have become the brightest lights in the literary firmament, have gone tottering to the grave, ere the star of their glory had arisen to public view. A neglect of the simplest duties of life, had cut them off in their youth, and defeated the accomplishment of their noble purposes.

But, from the physical, let us turn to the spiritual; and here it hardly seems proper to consider mental and moral culture separately, for no truly noble education of the one can exist without the other. Yet there is a mental training which gives power, even where the faculties of the soul may not have their proper exercise. Had the heart of Napoleon received the highest order of cultivation, and had he recognized the true destiny of life, the combined nations of Europe might have to-day been enjoying the blessings of freedom. But that bright luminary has passed away, radiating throughout the world the splendors of a mind made powerful by the force of long and untiring discipline. In the pursuit of Mental Perfection, development and discipline are alone sufficient. By development we mean the inducing to action all the faculties of the mind. Each should be culivated in due proportion, and none receive undue importance at the sacrifice of others. We have heard of a memory so retentive as to be able to rehearse literally the whole contents of the Bible; others, having this faculty so highly cultivated as to carry with them the dates and details of every occurrence recorded on the page of history, yet with reasoning powers so dormant as not to be able to use these great resources to the least possible advantage. Some perceive all objects through the eye of the imagination, furnishing no aliment to their minds, save what they find in the works of fiction and the wanderings of their own fancy, never subjugating themselves to patient and truthful investigation. Others indulge their imagination so slightly, that all their exhibitions are cold and lifeless. This, then, is a true development of our intellectual gifts, which consists in cultivating each with a just proportion, that all our powers may be prepared for action, and combine in glorious harmony. While, by calling out all our faculties, true development can only be obtained, yet habitual and laborious exercise can alone make them powerful—this, then, is the force of discipline. As the war-horse, by careful training, becomes fitted to act an important part in the hour of conflict, so the mind, by rigid and unyielding application, becomes obedient to the dictates of the will; and he who has truly learned how to study, has made great advancement in the progress of mental culture. Too much stress cannot be placed upon the importance of probing every mystery and removing every difficulty that may beset us in our educational career. Truly did the heathen philosopher remark, that the gods have given nothing useful to mortals without great labor; while history and reason furnish us with the solacing truth, that the ordinary mind, empowered with a thorough education, is far better fitted to fill any responsible calling in life than the brightest genius without mental discipline.

But before leaving this part of our theme, we must pause to notice one truth which is the foundation of all durable advancement. The most valuable results must always be the prompting of the highest motives—and the purest and strongest motive which can impel the student to continued action, is the greatest possible cultivation of the mind. All objects of worldly ambition, to gratify the hopes of parents, to attain popular and influential positions in future life, to gain a superiority over a zealous rival, are, without something lying back of them, all unworthy of the great object of life. A spirit of just emulation is commendable; for did not the noble deeds of others enkindle within us a desire after superiority, our energies would be too seldom aroused to action. All of these are great aids to the grand moving power, but not to be depended upon alone. They influence us now and then, but exert no constant force. And that student, who has no other motive to intellectual culture than the gratification of ambitious longings, will be visited during his academical career by fearful misgivings of the course he has adopted. While triumphs and defeats alternately meet him, and his prospects of future honor frequently fade away, he will be fatally solicited to turn in despondency from the path before him. But should he even survive these changing emotions, and hope lead him on, disappointments will lower around him; and, with his soul lacerated with the bitter pangs of unawarded merit, will at last fail of his purpose. An Achilles may fight the battles, but an Agamemnon may bear away the prize. But if one's motives be the highest development of his intellectual faculties, there are no mortifications of beclouded prospects to check his onward growth. There is no failure to such an one. Every effort is a triumph, so much knowledge gained from the domain of ignorance, so much fresh power added to the mind. He has a spirit within, that suffers no change, but exerts its influence powerfully and steadily, even to the end. It was the embodiment of this idea that caused the sun of Newton's life to grow brighter as it approached its cloudless horizon

Yet the lives of an Alexander, a Cæsar, and a Charlemagne, should teach us there is a beauty which personal perfection requires, that human power cannot achive. These heroic spirits, like lurid meteors, shot athwart the Eastern sky, but they radiate a crimson hue. The monuments of their deeds cannot swell the soul with emotions of holy reverence. The illustrious notes of Byron chant a mournful dirge over the departure of truth and innocence. Yet in these sad exhibitions of wasted powers there is much to admire. We seldom, if ever, see combined in a single individual all the virtues of humanity. And as the painter, in tracing out his model of perfected beauty, must select from one character an expressive eye, from another a roseate complexion or a graceful figure; so, would you design a model of human grandeur, blend the indomitable will of a Napoleon, and the tender susceptibilities and poetic imagery of a Shelley, with the philosophy of a Bacon, and underlay them all with the love of Christ, and you have a character, if not the greatest in one direction, yet complete in itself, for it possesses a due proportion of all virtues. This characteristic, then, that lends the crowning grace to physical and mental culture, is the exhibition of a spirit of genuine love. This spirit embraces all that is purely human within us, and all that is ennobling without. It is confined to no party or creed, but it opens the door of the inner sanctuary, that God himself may enter. That was a noble act of the Roman centurion, when he plunged the dagger into the heart of his daughter, to preserve her honor inviolate. The anxious solicitude of a fond sister for the fate of her erring and dissolute brother, is a mark of genuine love. But it is a mark of higher benevolence still, when the patriot turns from the companion of his heart, and sacrifices his happiness, and endures unmitigating toil, for the welfare of his country. Paul's life is a sublime record of benevolence. But that was the most disinterested love that drew the Saviour from his celestial home, and the association of angels, to die for a world of humanity. There is a moral beauty in that sacrifice, that neither human eye nor the piercing vision of angelic host can fully measure. And yet, would we aspire for moral perfection, it is this kind of benevolence that must come welling up from the fountains of our hearts. What a sublime position for humanity to attain! There is no envy there, for envy has no place in a generous mind. Neither will the poisoned arrows of malevolence destroy its peace, for the object of their aim is beyond their reach. But while it bespeaks emotions of kindness toward all, loving spirits will throng around, to enjoy its holy influence. What is there that we ever love except for its purity and loveliness? Our admiration is excited when we hear the tones of the angry storm-cloud, and the earth trembles beneath it. We wonder at the heroic deeds of those who have attained the highest niche of human glory; but yet we love the playful tones of the infant, for they bespeak an amiable heart. The last prayer of the Christian martyr, expiring for the cause of truth, supplicating heaven to save his cruel murderers, is a touching example of genuine love. The world has seen few such spirits, but enough to prove our theme a reality. Socrates, living in a heathen age, with nought but the light of nature to guide his soul upward, has taught us a lesson of philanthropy. Luther's life was one of hardships and sufferings, but the high approbation of posterity has amply atoned for the offering, while his purified spirit has gone to gain a brighter reward. It were well would we commune with these noble dead, for by studying their characters we might be induced to emulate their virtues,

How glorious the pursuit of personal culture, and how certain the reward! And yet how many, with gifted minds, and hearts susceptible of the highest delight, whose glorious goodness should be heard and praised throughout all the world, have gone down the tide of time, leaving no mark behind them, save the demoralizing effects of a dissolute life. And how many of the present day are concealing beneath a dark pall of sensuality, powers that might reform the world—jewels that might glitter with ever increasing brilliancy in an immortal crown. There is a glory hovering about that one who has for his motive the highest development of his immortal nature. And though the honors of the great may not deck his brow in this life, yet he grieves not; for the object of his pursuit is fraught with sufficent interest to fill his soul. And though nations may not watch over his departing spirit, yet angels will, and bear it to the bosom of divine love.

ALFRED ACADEMY.

RULES FOR HOME EDUCATION.

1. From your children's earliest infancy inculcate the necessity of instant obedience.

2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children always understand that you mean what you say.

3. Never promise them anything unless you are quite sure you can give them what you promise.

4. If you tell a little child to do something, show him how to do it, and see that it is done.

5. Always punish your children for willfully disobeying your commands, but never punish them in anger.

6. Never let them perceive that they can vex you, or make you lose your self-command.

7. If they give way to petulence and temper, wait till they are calm, and then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.

8. Remember that a little present punishment, when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment, should the fault be renewed.

9. Never give your children anything because they cry for it.

10. On no account allow them to do at one time what you have forbidden, under like circumstances, at another.

11. Teach them that the only sure and easy way to appear good, is to be good.

12. Accustom them to make their little recitals with perfect truth.

13. Never allow tale-bearing.

14. Teach them that self-denial, not self-indulgence, is the appointed and sure method of securing happiness.

15. Guard them against the indulgence of an angry and resentful spirit.

If these rules were reduced to practice—daily practice—by parents and guardians, how much misery would be prevented, how many in danger of ruin would be saved, and how largely would the happiness of a thousand domestic circles be augmented. It is lamentable to see how extensive is parental neglect, and to witness the bad and dreadful consequences in the ruin of thousands.

SUGGESTIONS ABOUT SCHOOLS.

DUTIES OF PARENTS TO SCHOOLS.

1. Parents should send their children to school constantly and seasonably. 2. They should see that they are decently clothed, and cleanly in their persons. 3. They should encourage them to respect and obey the rules and requirements of the school. 4. They should encourage them to be orderly in their deportment, and studiously to regard right. 5. They should encourage them to be studious, by manifesting an interest in their lessons. 6. They should have a regard for the character of the books their children read, and see that they read understandingly. 7. They should cultivate in their children habits of true politeness and courtesy. 8. Besides visiting the school and co-operating and sympathizing with the teacher, they can do much for its improvement and success, by manifesting, at all proper times and in all proper places, an interest in its welfare, and a deep solicitude for its reputation; by speaking well of the teacher and of all his judicious plans; by palliating or excusing his faults or failings, (of which every teacher must be expected to have some;) and by inducing their neighbors to visit the school and take an interest in its exercises; thus showing to their children, in the most convincing manner, that they feel that their present employment is an important one, and that the duties of school are not to be regarded as of little consequence.

DUTIES OF CHILDREN AT SCHOOL.

1. Scholars should be constant in their attendance at school. 2. They should always endeavor to be at school in season. 3. They should have a strict regard to all the regulations of the school. 4. They should be studious, and improve all their time to the best possible advantage. 5. They should be honest in regard to their lessons. 6. They should be neat and orderly in their personal appearance and habits. 7. They should avoid the use of profane and improper language. 8. They should always speak and act the truth. 9. They should be kind and pleasant to their companions, and to all with whom they have intercourse. 10. Their deportment in the street and elsewhere should be orderly and becoming. 11. They should love God and keep his commandments.

Should every scholar in all our schools faithfully perform these duties, not one would require punishment, or even a reprimand during the present winter. How delightful a place would the school-room be, what a pleasant employment would that of the teacher prove, and with what alacrity would all the scholars resort to school and engage in their duties, if all were aiming to discharge these duties to the best of their ability!

"SEEM NOT—BE."

BY MIRA.

Are there words, whose wealth of meaning
  May excel these, "Seem not—be?"
Or from which is brighter gleaming
  All that's truthful, noble, free?
Can you, in this world of ours,
  Buddings find, that have the art
To expand in brighter flowers,
  'Mong the green leaves of the heart?

Fair youth, with the world before thee,
  And the light of love around,
While young hope is bending o'er thee,
  Whispering words of sweetest sound—
Thou who lov'st the pure and noble,
  But dost covet worldly fame—
Oh, beware! lest thy ambition
  Teach thee wisdom but in name.

Maiden, with the brow of beauty,
  And the voice of witching tone,
Would'st thou be beloved, and truly—
  Cherished for thyself alone?
Then away with idle seeming;
  Cast aside earth's hollow show;
Cherish thoughts whose fairer beaming,
  Shall o'er all thy nature glow.

Middle aged, you who are wrestling
  With the sterner things of life,
On whose anxious souls are resting
  Heavy burdens, pain and strife—
Upward look, and ever faithful
  To the trusts reposed in thee,
Weary never of the rightful;
  Steadfast, noble, manly be.

Youthful, aged, son of pleasure,
  Man of God, or child of earth,
You possess the richest treasure
  In your love for things of worth;
Now be truthful, and while seeming
  To be all that you revere,
Let your inmost soul be feeling
  That you are indeed sincere.

Brother, sister, whatsoever
  Your life's station, "seem not—be;"
Let the gleam of falsehood never
  Dim the light of truth in thee;
For thy guiding star, take duty,
  With a satellite of love;
And know this, that peace and beauty
  Shall attend thy path above.

A DOLLAR ON THE CONSCIENCE.

"Fifty-five cents a yard, I believe you said?" The customer was opening her purse.

Now fifty cents a yard was the price of the goods, and so Mr. Levering had informed the lady. She misunderstood him, however.

In the community, Mr. Levering had the reputation of being a conscientious, high-minded man. He knew that he was thus estimated, and self-complacently appropriated the good opinion as clearly his due.

It came instantly to the lip of Mr. Levering to say, "Yes, fifty-five." The love of gain was strong in his mind, and ever ready to accede to new plans for adding dollar to dollar. But, ere the words were uttered, a disturbing perception of something wrong restrained him.

"I wish twenty yards," said the customer, taking it for granted that fifty-five cents was the price of the goods.

Mr. Levering was still silent; though he commenced promptly to measure off the goods.

"Not dear at that price," remarked the lady.

"I think not," said the store-keeper. "I bought the case of goods, from which this piece was taken, low."

"Twenty yards at fifty-five cents! Just eleven dollars." The customer opened her purse as she thus spoke, and counted out the sum in glittering gold dollars. "That is right, I believe," and she pushed the money toward Mr. Levering, who, with a kind of automatic movement of his hand, drew forward the coin, and swept it into the till.

"Send the bundle to No. 300 Argyle-st.," said the lady, with a bland smile, as she turned from the counter and the half-bewildered store-keeper.

"Stay, madam! there is a slight mistake!" The words were in Mr. Levering's thoughts, and on the point of gaining utterance, but he had not the courage to speak. He had gained a dollar in the transaction beyond his due, and already it was lying heavily on his conscience. Willingly would he have thrown it off; but when about to do so, the quick suggestion came, that in acknowledging to the lady the fact of her having paid five cents a yard too much, he might falter in his explanation, and thus betray his attempt to do her a wrong. And so he kept silence, and let her depart beyond recall.

Any thing gained at the price of virtuous self-respect, is acquired at too large a cost. A single dollar on the conscience may press so heavily as to bear down a man's spirits, and rob him of all the delights of life. It was so in the present case. Vain was it that Mr. Levering sought self-justification. Argue the matter as he would, he found it impossible to escape the smarting conviction that he had unjustly exacted a dollar from one of his customers. Many times through the day he found himself in a musing, abstracted state, and, on rousing himself therefrom, became conscious in his external thought that it was the dollar by which he was troubled.

"I'm very foolish," said he, mentally, as he walked homeward, after closing his store for the evening. "Very foolish to worry myself about a trifle like this. The goods were cheap enough at fifty-five cents, and she is quite as well contented with her bargain as if she had only paid fifty."

But it would not do. The dollar was on his conscience, and he sought in vain to remove it by efforts of this kind.

Mr. Levering had a wife and three pleasant children. They were the sunlight of his home. When the business of the day was over, he usually returned to his own fireside with buoyant feeling. It was not so on this occasion. There was a pressure on his bosom—a want of self-satisfaction. The kiss of his wife, and the clinging arms of his children, as they were twined around his neck, did not bring the old delight.

"What is the matter with you this evening, dear? Are you not well?" inquired Mrs. Levering, breaking in upon the thoughtful mood of her husband, as he sat in unwonted silence.

"I'm perfectly well," he replied, rousing himself, and forcing a smile.

"You look sober."

"Do I?" Another forced smile.

"Something troubles you, I'm afraid."

"O no; it's all in your imagination."

"Are you sick, papa?" now asks a bright little fellow, clambering upon his knee.

"Why, no, love, I'm not sick. Why did you think so?"

"Because you don't play horse with me."

"Oh dear! Is that the ground of your suspicion?" replied the father, laughing. "Come! we'll soon scatter them to the winds."

And Mr. Levering commenced a game of romps with the children. But he tired long before they grew weary, nor did he, from the beginning, enter into this sport with his usual zest.

"Does your head ache, pa?" inquired the child who had previously suggested sickness, as he saw his father leave the floor, and seat himself, with some gravity of manner, on a chair.

"Not this evening, dear," answered Mr. Levering.

"Why dont't you play longer, then!"

"Oh, pa! exclaimed another child, speaking from a sudden thought, "you don't know what a time we had at school to-day.

"Ah! what was the cause?"

"Oh! you'll hardly believe it. But Eddy Jones stole a dollar from Maggy Enfield!"

"Stole a dollar!" ejaculated Mr. Levering. His voice was husky, and he felt a cold chill passing along every nerve.

"Yes, pa! he stole a dollar! Oh, wasn't it dreadful?"

"Perhaps he was wrongly accused," suggested Mrs. Levering.

"Emma Wilson saw him do it, and they found the dollar in his pocket. Oh! he looked so pale, and it made me almost sick to hear him cry as if his heart would break."

"What did they do with him?" asked Mrs. Levering.

"They sent for his mother, and she took him home. Wasn't it dreadful?"

"It must have been dreadful for his poor mother," Mr. Levering ventured to remark.

"But more dreadful for him," said Mrs. Levering. "Will he ever forget his crime and disgrace? Will the pressure of that dollar on his conscience ever be removed? He may never do so wicked an act again, but the memory of this wrong deed cannot be wholly effaced from his mind."

How rebukingly fell all these words on the ear of Mr. Levering! Ah! what would he not then have given to have the weight of that dollar removed? Its pressure was so great as almost to suffocate him. It was all in vain that he tried to be cheerful, or take an interest in what was passing immediately around him. The innocent prattle of his children had lost its wonted charm, and there seemed an excusing expression in the eye of his wife, as, in the concern his changed aspect had occasioned, she looked soberly upon him. Unable to bear all this, Mr. Levering went out, something unusual for him, and walked the streets for an hour. On his return, the children were in bed, and he had regained sufficient self-control to meet his wife with a less disturbed appearance.

On the next morning, Mr. Levering felt something better. Sleep had left his mind more tranquil. Still there was a pressure on his feelings, which thought could trace back to that unlucky dollar. About an hour after going to his store, Mr. Levering saw his customer of the day previous enter, and move along towards the place where he stood behind his counter. His heart gave a sudden bound, and the color rose to his face. An accusing conscience was quick to conclude as to the object of her visit. But he soon saw that no suspicion of wrong dealing was in the lady's mind. With a pleasant, half recognition, she asked to look at certain articles, from which she made purchases, and in paying for them, placed a ten dollar bill in the hand of the store-keeper.

"That weight shall be off my conscience," said Mr. Levering to himself, as he began counting out the change due to his customer; and, purposely, he gave her one dollar more than was justly hers in that transaction. The lady glanced her eyes over the money, and seemed slightly bewildered. Then, much to the store-keeper's relief, opened her purse, and dropped it therein.

"All right again!" was the mental ejaculation of Mr. Levering, as he saw the purse disappear in the lady's pocket, while his breast expanded with a sense of relief.

The customer turned from the counter, and had nearly gained the door, when she paused, drew out her purse, and emptying the contents of one end into her hand, carefully noted the amount. Then walking back, she said with a thoughtful air—

"I think you've made a mistake in the change, Mr. Levering."

"I presume not, ma'am. I gave you four dollars and thirty-five," was the quick reply.

"Four thirty-five," said the lady, musingly. "Yes, here is just four thirty-five."

"That's right; yes, that's right," Mr. Levering spoke, somewhat nervously.

"The article came to six dollars and sixty-five cents, I believe?"

"Yes, yes, that was it!"

"Then three dollars and thirty-five cents will be my right change," said the lady, placing a small gold coin on the counter. "You gave me too much."

The customer turned away, and retired from the store, leaving that dollar still on the conscience of Mr. Levering. "I'll throw it into the street," said he to himself, impatiently, "or give it to the first beggar that comes along." But conscience whispered that the dollar wasn't his, either to give away or to throw away. Such prodigality, or impulsive benevolence, would be at the expense of another, and this could not mend the matter.

"This is all squeamishness," said Mr. Levering, trying to argue against his convictions. But it was of no avail. His convictions remained as clear and rebuking as ever.

The next day was the Sabbath, and Mr. Levering went to church, as usual, with his family. Scarcely had he taken a seat in his pew, when on raising his eyes, they rested on the countenance of the lady from whom he had abstracted the dollar. How quickly his cheek flushed! How troubled became, instantly, the strings of his heart! Unhappy Mr. Levering! He did not make the usual responses, that day, in the sermon, and when the congregation joined in the swelling song of praise, his voice was not heard. Scarcely a word of the eloquent sermon reached his ears, except something about "dealing justly;" he was too deeply engaged in solving the question whether or no he should get rid of the unwholesome dollar by dropping it into the contribution box, at the close of the morning service, to listen to the words of the preacher. This question was not settled when the box came round. But this disposition of the money proved only a temporary palliative. There was still a pressure on his feelings; still a weight on his conscience that gradually became heavier. Poor man! What was he to do? How was he to get this dollar removed from his conscience? He could not send it back to the lady and tell her the whole truth. Such an exposure of himself would not only be humiliating, but hurtful to his character. It would be seeking to do right in the infliction of a wrong to himself.

At last Mr. Levering, who had ascertained the lady's name and residence, inclosed her a dollar, anonymously, stating that it was her due; that the writer had obtained it from her unjustly, in a transaction which he did not care to name, and could not rest until he had made restitution.

Ah! the humiliation of spirit suffered by Mr. Levering in thus seeking to get ease for his conscience! It was one of his bitterest life experiences. The longer the dollar remained in his possession, the heavier became its pressure, until he could endure it no longer. He felt not only disgraced in his own eyes, but humiliated in the presence of his wife and children. Not for worlds would he have suffered them to look into his heart.

If a simple act of restitution could have covered all the past, happy would it have been for Mr. Levering. But this was not possible. The deed was entered in the book of his life, and nothing could efface the record. Though obscured by the accumulating dust of time, now and then a hand sweeps unexpectedly over the page, and the writing is revealed. Though that dollar has been removed from his conscience, and he is now guiltless of wrong, yet there are times when the old pressure is felt with painful distinctness.

Earnest seeker after this world's goods, take warning by Mr. Levering, and beware how, in a moment of weak yielding, you get a dollar on your conscience. One of two evils must follow. It will give you pain and trouble, or callous the spot where it rests. And the latter of those evils is that which is most to be deplored. [Godey's Lady Book.

MOSES—HIS MORAL GREATNESS.

In respect to his moral endowments, Moses has not always been justly appreciated. The stern lawgiver was not all sternness. Even his violent passions, for such undoubtedly he had, did not break forth at his own personal wrongs. He thought for his nation and for his trust far more than for himself, and in his treatment of the Egyptian oppressor and the rebels of his own camp, there is a disinterested grandeur in his very vehemence. The poems that bear his name are wonderful alike for their tender humility and exalted confidence. He leaned upon a sovereign power as a lowly and faithful servant, and thus performing his work as under divine guidance, he was brave and bold in his very meekness, strong not to do his own will, but the Lord's. There is more truth than in these days has been generally allowed in the old primer that called Moses the meekest of men. Humility is not the pliant, supple thing that the superficial suppose it to be. Columbus was humble, when refusing to sacrifice to the ridicule of the multitude the belief which he believed providentially given, that a new world awaited his adventurous fleet. Luther was humble when, lifting up the Bible before the Imperial Diet, he refused to recant, and stood boldly upon the ground of the New Testament against royal threats and Papal anathemas. Paul was humble, when, at Athens, and before Agrippa, and at Rome, he bodly professed his allegiance to Christ, and confirmed his allegiance at last under the executioner's sword. What, indeed, is humility, but the surrender of man's will to the Divine will—a surrender that may give proof of itself, now in lowly penitence and prayer, and now in bold confession and heroic daring?

Moses was the civil and religious counsellor, and this office shows the nature of his mind, the greatness of his influence. To him belongs the high dignity of devoting his life to a sacred aim, whose results only ages could exhibit. Of those previous to Christ, his name stands first among the leaders, lawgivers, and prophets of our race. How noble he appears in his anticipations of the greater than himself, and of the age better than his own! He claimed not to know all of God's will, nor to have exhausted the Divine light. His face, so generally associated with stern command and imperious law, beamed not seldom with yearning for a brighter day. The lawgiver should stand before us, not in the arrogance of self-complacent righteousness, but with an humble longing for a blessed time beyond his own best achievement—a time to follow dark centuries of idolatry and degradation with ages of peace and virtue above aught that his own eyes had seen. His character was not unlike the rock which he smote in the desert. [Osgood.

Business Notice.—The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society has been in operation nearly five years—long enough, certainly, to carry on the publishing business without a thorough settlement of accounts. Such a settlement we intend to have before the close of the present volume of the Sabbath Recorder. An Agent has been engaged for the purpose, who will enter upon his work about the first of February. Those indebted to the establishment need be in no doubt as to the amount of their indebtedness, inasmuch as bills have been sent them each year. What we wish now to say to them is, that in all cases where the amount of those bills is forwarded to us immediately, by mail direct, or through our local agents, the accounts will be squared on our books. In all cases where payment is delayed until the Agent calls, fifty cents per year will be added, according to our published terms. Promptness will save the trouble and expense of a call from the agent.

THE DUTY OF EVERY CHRISTIAN TO PREACH THE GOSPEL—AGAIN.

Our readers must have discovered, from our remarks last week, that our idea of preaching the gospel, as enjoined by Christ in the Great Commission, is somewhat different from the popular one. We suppose the gospel is preached, whenever Christ is presented to perishing sinners as an all-sufficient Saviour. It makes no difference whether this is done in the way of a set discourse to a public assembly, or in the way of a fire side conversation—whether to a company regularly gathered for the purpose, or to a little group casually met with—whether by ordained ministers, or by those who are not recognized in the character of ministers—whether by men, or by women—whether by white persons, or by those of dark skin—whether by slaves in bondage, or by those who glory in being free. Any kind of communication, which conveys in clear and intelligible language to a perishing sinner his need of a Saviour, and that Jesus is the very Saviour he needs, is preaching the gospel to him. And this is just what Christ meant, when he said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

According to this view, it is not necessary, in order that one may preach the gospel, that he be able to instruct believers in Christian doctrine. It is only necessary that he bear witness to the simple fact, that Christ is risen from the dead, with power to save. As the word preach means simply to proclaim—to announce, or publish—and as the word gospel means simply good news—that is, the good news that Christ, once crucified for sins, is risen from the dead, with power to save to the uttermost all that come to God by him—so the Commission, rightly interpreted, means nothing more nor less than this:—'I, Jesus, that was dead, am alive again; all power in heaven and in earth is vested in me; go, you that love me, tell the good news to every body.' Now, is not any one capable of fulfilling a commission thus simple? Is not the humblest disciple in the church capable of doing it? Is it necessary that he be specially called and ordained to the work, the same as if he were to be invested with the pastorship or oversight of a church? No, it is a simple story, that any body can tell; and if told in sincerity and earnestness, Christ will bless the telling of it.

Yet of this kind of preaching very little is done; and if any of it is done, the people, for the most part, think the minister must do it. For their own part they calculate to live honestly, to show kindness to the distressed, labor in useful callings, attend upon the ordinances of religion, and do what they can in the way of recommending religion indirectly; but if any thing is to be said about Christ in the way of a direct appeal to the unconverted, it is the minister's business, not theirs.

We are firmly persuaded, that this indirect method of preaching Christianity will never suffice to develop the power of the system. And if the Church contents herself with it, few and limited will be the triumphs of Truth. Satan will continue to hold the world in bondage, as he now does. The reasons of our persuasion are these:—

1. It is not in accordance with the divine plan. It is God's plan, that sinners shall be saved through the preaching of Christ crucified. 1 Cor. 1 : 18, &c. Rom. 1 : 16. And any scheme which leaves out this great doctrine, or even puts it in the back-ground, is offensive to Him. He cannot attend it with his blessing. And who is mad enough to suppose, that any scheme will succeed without His blessing? If we believe that the carnal mind is enmity against God—if we believe that the heart is corrupt, and fully set to do evil—we cannot suppose that men would be persuaded by any arguments whatever to change their course, unless those arguments were accompanied with a divine influence, making them see and feel the evil of sin, and that there is a way in which they can be pardoned. But this divine influence is inseparable from the gospel. It accompanies no scheme which ignores, or undervalues, the great doctrine of Atonement. This doctrine must be made prominent. It must be set forward, and made first, in every scheme which aims at the salvation of the world. We may be unable to see why it should always be made so prominent, and may therefore think it foolish to be forever holding it forth as the beginning and end of all reformatory effort. We may think it would be wiser to go at the work in another manner. But God has determined otherwise; and we may rest assured, that His blessing will accompany the scheme which He has determined upon, and not the one which human wisdom dictates.

Now, we suppose that Christians, for the most part—at least so many of them as our remarks are likely to reach—would reply, that they have no disposition to undervalue the Atonement, and could by no means reject it, as an unimportant doctrine of Scripture. Theoretically, perhaps, this is true. But an orthodox theory, floating somewhere in the upper regions of the head, but not coming down low enough to influence the heart, and (by consequence) the "issues of life," is of little account. What is the practical system of Christians? What is that which they habitually act out? They (that is, the better portion of them) do indeed show their good works—they are careful to display their regard for righteousness in all their dealings with mankind—but, for any thing that ever passes their lips, no one would ever know whether this righteousness were the fruit of their faith in Christ, or merely the result of a good education. And they confine themselves so strictly to this indirect method of recommending Christianity, that the doctrine of Atonement is seldom, or never, heard from them. They do not preach the gospel. Christ crucified is practically ignored in all their attempts to influence the lives of their fellow creatures. It is set forth only in the minister's sermons.

But the minister's sermons do not make the doctrine prominent enough—that is, they are not sufficient to create in the mind of the community a conviction, that the whole body of Christians is alive to its importance. The people need to hear the doctrine, not only from the minister, but from every church member. When they see the whole church zealous to make it known,—when they see this badge of discipleship worn by every member, and all striving to display it as the power which is to redeem the world, and the only power which can redeem it,—they can hold out no longer. An overturning follows at once, proving that nothing was gained, when Christians were ashamed to preach Christ, and that every thing is gained, when they are bold to proclaim him.

2. The ultimate tendency of this plan is to wear away the holiness of the church itself. We have said, and it is universally admitted, that holiness of conduct on the part of God's people is indispensable to the moral power of the church. But how is this holiness to be maintained? It must have something to feed upon; and sound reason would say, that the instrumentality which developed it in the first place, was necessary to perpetuate it. Now, it is the doctrine of Christ crucified, received by faith, that is the means of creating the soul anew in righteousness and true holiness. No person was ever made holy without it. And it is certain, as all experience proves, that growth in holiness is promoted only by constant meditations in, and actings of faith upon, the Great Atonement. This being so, would not the work of proclaiming to sinners the fullness of Christ as a Saviour, be the means of establishing believers themselves in holiness? Would it not make them more holy? For, certainly, the more their minds are occupied with that which first broke up the love of sin with themselves, the more holy they must become. And, conversely, the less they are thus occupied, the greater is the opportunity for sin to regain its ascendancy over them. Now, as most Christians habitually neglect to preach Christ to others, so their minds are not as constantly stirred up to the subject as they ought to be. What they hear from the minister on the Sabbath, joined with their own private exercises, is about all the stimulus they have. They have not excitement enough to keep their minds actively exercised upon Christ and Him Crucified. And what is the consequence? Why, just what might be expected. Their holiness wanes. Their zeal grows cold. They become worldly, prayerless, indifferent to the cause of God. Sin gets the ascendancy; selfishness begins to manifest itself in their actions; the world says of them, that there is little difference between them and those that make no profession. And, alas! it is too true.

Now, if there is such a power in the doctrine of Christ crucified as the word of Inspiration declares, and as every real Christian knows, it is worthy of being employed more extensively by the Church than it is now, and more extensively than it can be by the limited ministry under her control. "Would God, that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them!"

Addition to "A new Roman Catholic Prayer."—The Sabbath Recorder of Dec. 15th contained the following:—

"Almighty and eternal God, who savest all, and wilt have none to perish, have regard to those souls who are led astray by the deceits of the devil, that, rejecting all errors, the hearts of those who err may be converted, and may return to the unity of Thy truth, through Christ our Lord. Amen."

The proposed addition to the above prayer is:—

We mean, Lord, such as are "giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding [their priests] to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, [on Fridays, and during lent, &c.,] which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." Amen. 1 Tim. 4th chap.

A PROTESTANT.

New England Society.—On the evening of Dec. 22d, the New England Society of the City of New York celebrated their 48th anniversary, and the 233d anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock. A discourse was preached by Rev. Mark Hopkins, D. D., at the Church of the Puritans, Union Square. On the following evening, the Annual Dinner was given by the Society, at the Astor House, and was attended by a large number of distinguished descendants of New England, several of whom delivered addresses appropriate to the occasion.

SKETCHES FROM NOTES OF A TOUR THROUGH VIRGINIA AND OHIO.

Having made arrangements to meet the stage at the Post-Office at about 4 o'clock the next morning, I took lodgings about a quarter of a mile distant. Just as I was invited to sit down to a breakfast which had been prepared by the hand of that hospitality for which the people of this country are remarkable, the rumbling of an old-fashioned "Yankee" coach along the turnpike announced the arrival of my conveyance. I hastened on, accompanied by John Davis, Esq., my obliging host, as far as the river, (Middle Island,) which lay across my way. He "set" me over, in a little craft that is kept here for the purpose of shortening the path to "town," and I was soon at the Post-Office, where I waited for the tardy operation of changing the mail, &c., long enough to have eaten breakfast a number of times. We were, however, after a while, "under motion" for Parkersburgh. The distance is 56 miles. The turnpike runs, much of the way, through uninhabited portions of country, winding right and left, like a crawling serpent, as do all the ways here, for the purpose of securing an easier grade. The "Stage Houses" are mostly solitary log buildings.

On starting from the first of these stopping places to which we came, where we had an opportunity to breakfast, I chose a seat on the outside; which I found very convenient for the observation of whatever new or interesting appearance lay along our secluded way. Among the novelties, I noticed a nervous acting little reptile, wriggling along, which, on being described, my companionable "Jehu" said must be a scorpion.

There are venomous serpents of various kinds all through the country, but the people seem by no means to regard it a serious matter to be bitten by them. I saw not less than six or seven persons who had been bitten—one young man three times in the same foot, once by a rattlesnake, and twice by copperheads. One man, however, whom I saw in an almost helpless condition, attributed it, mostly, to the bite of a snake in the hand.

This man is one of a somewhat numerous family here, from New Jersey. Their ancestors were from Wales. His brother, Eld. Ezekiel Bee, of the Middle Island Church, told me that when a boy, before coming to Virginia, he had seen a very ancient manuscript history of the family, which he believed to be an abridgment of an older and more extended work. This history, he said, showed that the family were the descendants of Abraham; and though at a remote period they embraced Christianity, they had never forsaken the observance of the Sabbath. I think he said, also, that it referred to a time when Sabbath-keepers in Wales were very numerous. He is unable to tell where the manuscript is, but thinks that it fell to some branch of the family, formerly living in the eastern part of Pennsylvania. If it could be found, it would, perhaps, bring to light many interesting facts. May not some of the old people of New Jersey be instrumental in furnishing a clew to its discovery? If in existence, my informant says, it must be in the possession of those who do not now observe the Sabbath.

Some twenty miles from Parkersburgh, we passed what they call a burning spring. The driver stopped the coach and went with us to the spot. It is near the turnpike, on a high hill, and comes out from under a ledge of rock just reaching the surface. There are two apertures within a few feet of each other. The amount of water discharged is very small, and the escape of gas is attended with a constant bubbling. Some lighted paper was held near the water, instantaneously igniting the gas, which burned with an unsteady flame, as if its escape were at intervals, like breathing. The flame seemed also to be drawn in, as if there were a movement in opposite directions. We left it burning, which continues until it is by some means extinguished. A strong wind is sufficient for the purpose.

It was dark before we reached Parkersburgh, and the river was still so low that boats run with no regularity, none having passed, either way, for twenty-four hours. The landing, all along the Ohio, above Cincinnati, is effected by means of floating wharves. The "wharf-boat" here being constructed with a view to lodging detained travelers, as boats were every hour expected, I determined to avail myself of this opportunity to be on hand, in case one should arrive. Having paid a "quarter" for the use of a berth, which might have been disposed of to the advantage of my successor in the purchase and use of "Lyon's Powder," I lay down; but not to sleep. About midnight I was aroused from a state of nervous abstraction by the shrill whistle of a boat for Cincinnati. I hurried down, and was soon on board, and under way.

The passage, until we reached the mouth of the Great Kanawha, was slow and tedious. The scenery along the river is not very attractive. There is, however, a marked difference, most of the way, in appearances of enterprise and thrift, in favor of the Ohio side. Almost all the landings were on that side. Among the interests that attract business here, besides agriculture, iron and coal seemed to be prominent.

My two companions, one a Pennsylvanian, who had come with me from West Union, and the other the son of a Virginia slave-holder, who had met us at Parkersburgh, were very sociable men, and did much to abate the tediousness of the passage. The Pennsylvanian was a Presbyterian, and a plain husbandman. I had some conversation with him upon the subject of the Sabbath. He took a number of the positions which are commonly taken, in justification of treating the first day of the week as Sabbath, and when I reviewed them, he frankly acknowledged that they did not stand the test of criticism. "But," said he, "if I could express it as I think, I believe, after all, it is right."

The view of Cincinnati, from the deck of a steamer upon the river above, is very fine. It seems to sit nestling on the "sunny side" of a gentle inclination, laving its feet in the majestic Ohio; with a bold bluff for a screen, hung against the distant sky in the background.

My way, as far as I could proceed by railroad, was on the direct route from this place to Sandusky, on Lake Erie. I took the Cincinnati, Hamilton, and Dayton Railroad to the latter place, (where I left my two friends,) and the Mad River and Lake Erie Railroad to Huntsville. The country, especially between Cincinnati and Dayton, is exceedingly fine and beautiful.

Reached Huntsville about 11½ o'clock P.M., and found that I was within twelve miles of Sabbath-keeping friends. The next morning I found the landlord willing, though not anxious, to go and carry me that distance for $2 50. I thought I could better glorify God in walking the journey, than in paying that amount for the privilege of riding. I, however, found an opportunity to ride about four miles on the way, after which I shouldered my baggage, and set up an independent pedestrian line. The weather was oppressively warm, and when I reached Bro. Wm. Van Horn's, a distance of eight miles, I was glad to meet cordiality and find a place to rest.

VOICE—UTTERANCE.

Each temperament is marked by its peculiarity of voice—of utterance. The lymphatic drawls out, with a lazy, languid tone. The sanguine is sprightly and cheerful—words move lightly and animated. The nervous is quick, jerking, energetic, and generally without anything deep, rich, or sonorous in its utterance. The bilious gives a deep, full, energetic, bass voice. The endless intermingling of temperaments gives an endless variety of intonation.

Again, every state, desire, emotion, and feeling, creates a peculiarity of voice. Tranquillity, for instance, gives a gentle, easy flow of utterance. Dignity, solemnity, reverence, adoration, and all other sentiments producing respect or deliberation, are naturally expressed by a voice full, monotonous, and slow, with but slight and simple inflections. Gayety, facetiousness, eager argument, and earnest description, on the other hand, being opposite in character, require a sprightly, quick, natural utterance. Confidence, positiveness, authority, in affirming, denying, forbidding, reproving, commanding, denouncing, or defying, are indicated by the downward inflection of the voice, accompanied with energetic and forcible expression. Ill humor, discontent, petulence, repining, vexation, and chagrin, have a kind of whining, snapping, snarling way of manifesting themselves, more easily experienced than described. Hate, wrath, rage, malice, revenge, vary in their manifestations, from the low, guttural, inarticulate mutterings, with compressed lip and clenched fist, to quick, aspirated, abrupt vociferations. Envy, jealousy, scorn, disgust, derision, mockery, and execration, are generally slow and guttural—sometimes tremulous and piercing. Mirth, jollity, are often quick and broken in expression—delight, joy, exultation, and rapture, are slower, more dignified. Apprehension, fear, secrecy, mystery, curiosity, suspicion, eagerness, and hope, are manifested by a suppressed aspiration, often amounting to a whisper—admiration, astonishment, amazement, are more forcible and emphatic. Penitence, submission, petition, supplication, tenderness, love, condolence, pity, grief, and sorrow, manifest themselves in a slow, soft, tremulous voice, each word commencing slowly, lightly, tremblingly, and swelling in soft, full proportions, then dying away as gradually and as softly. Pain, bodily or mental, is tremulous, aspirated, broken—often running up into great force and high pitch of voice, when the pain is excessive. Terror breaks forth with great force, amounting, frequently, to a scream. Apathy, irresolution, shame, fatigue, weakness, speak with a voice slow, faltering, and feeble.

With such indices, we may determine, very accurately, the peculiarity of mind, as well as the emotions, states and desires, prompting the utterance manifested. You hear a voice, perhaps, drawling out half-formed words, that seem to ooze from half-opened lips. It indicates a being stupid and lazy—a spirit dull and sluggish. You hear again a voice voluble and flippant—the exponent of a tongue running hap-hazard upon all subjects and on all occasions. You instinctively feel that such a person cannot be trusted with important matters; for words, being such a cheap commodity, he will, very innocently of course, tell all that he knows, and more too. The most important injunction to such a one is to request him to close the flood-gates of his mind, whence are flowing all of his senses.

Listen, next, to that mellifluous voice, which sounds quietly and sweetly in your ear. Be assured that it is the voice of some gentle, quiet spirit, for such is not the utterance of rough, coarse, harsh spirits. A stranger voice of this stamp awakens an instinctive sympathy, from the fact that we take it as an index of his soul. Mark the contrast between such a voice and that of a coarse, vulgar, ill-natured churl. Every word comes harsh and grating. His language seems to saw rather than cut into your soul. Who does not, on hearing such a voice, shudder and shrink from too close approach? And why? Simply because you feel assured that his voice is an exponent of his character. Notice, next, those clear, silvery-voices. They ring out joyous and free, indicating a happy union of the strong, the gentle, and refined. Be assured that in such an one you will find a happy, good-hearted spirit, whose mission it is to make all around happy. The characteristics of another voice have been noticed in the earliest ages. Homer says:—

> "Still silence lulls the camp to peace,
> Theristes only clamored in the throng,
> Loquacious, loud and turbulent of tongue,
> Awed by no shame, by no respect controlled,
> In slander busy, in reproaches bold;
> With witty malice, studious to defame;
> Scorn all his joy, laughter all his aim."

There is another voice which sounds like the rumblings of distant thunder. The utterance is not rapid, perhaps, but comes as if backed up by some irresistible, some mighty impulse. Such characteristics are generally considered as indicative of depth, grasp, and power of intellect.

We mention one other voice, quite different from the last, but none the less marked. Every word is like the lightning's flash—every sentence comes like the quick clap of some earthward directed thunderbolt, bursting and shattering all opposing objects. Every drop of such a man's blood seems to contain what Faraday says every drop of water does—enough of electricity to burst the gable-end off of any house. Such men are the real go-ahead spirits, scaling walls, compassing land and sea, to accomplish their object. They are the regular high-pressure steam-engines, with a fifty pound weight upon each safety valve, and the steam hissing from every screw and jointure.

STREET PREACHING IN NEW YORK.

The arrest of Mr. Parsons, while preaching in the open air in the eastern part of New York City, has been the occasion of much excitement and discussion. Now that the excitement is past, and the naked facts are understood, the whole matter resolves itself into a mistake. There is a very proper and necessary city ordinance, which forbids preaching in the streets without special license, which ordinance the police had been instructed to enforce. Mr. Parsons was preaching in a spar-yard, by permission of its owner, which he had a perfect right to do. But a policeman, who did not perceive the difference between preaching in the open air and in the street, supposing that the ordinance had been broken, made the arrest out of which grew so much excitement. On the one side it was charged that Mr. P. was arrested because he declaimed against the Catholics, and on the other, that he was arrested simply for a breach of the city ordinance. The facts began to be understood before the following Sunday, and this circumstance, in connection with the restraining influence of the Mayor's Proclamation, preserved the city from threatened outbreak.

Just at this time, when the subject of street-preaching and freedom of speech is under discussion, the following suggestions from the Independent are worthy of consideration. Speaking of the street preachers, that paper says:—

Such persons remind us that the Saviour and his Apostles preached in the open air, and in the streets and markets of the cities, and they would feel convicted of a grievous lack of boldness and fidelity, unless they or somebody should stand upon the reservoir on the Sabbath and split their throats and lungs against a northwester, or should clear up the doctrine of depravity amid the density of an East River fog. Now, to reason from the climate and the social usages of Palestine to our own, is simply absurd. Palestine is an open-air, out-door country. For many months of the year the people sleep upon the ground or the house-top, almost without covering. By day business is carried on to a great extent in the open air. The shops are out of doors,—mere open stalls or niches along the sides of streets, which are commonly covered with some light roofing to keep off the sun. Sometimes they have not even this protection; and the chief market places, as at Gaza and at Joppa, are large open areas about the gates of the city. These are also chief places of concourse. There is not in any town in Palestine a hall for the purpose of public discussion. Excepting the mosques and the few churches, there are no places of public assembly; and in the time of Christ these were wanting. In Jerusalem the temple was then standing, and in one of its open cloisters our Saviour taught. The area of the temple, with the exception of the sanctuary itself, had no roof; neither had the theaters of Greece and Rome, of Herculaneum and Pompeii, any covering; neither has the vast modern arena at Milan. At Athens there was no covered hall in which Paul could address the multitude; Plato taught in an Academic grove; the supreme court of the Areopagus sat upon the summit of a rock hollowed out into a circular basin; Demosthenes spoke from a ledge of table rock surrounded with tiers of seats hewn from the same rock, and all open to the sun, in the sight of Pentilicus and Hymettus, and the Bay of Salamis, and the wide-spread Ægean. In the Agora, or on Mars Hill, or from the Pnyx, he must speak, if he spoke at all. Now to insist that because under the sky of Palestine and of Greece—where everything of a public nature was transacted in the open air—our Lord and his apostles preached in the open air, therefore we as faithful imitators of their example must preach out of doors in this changeable and killing climate, is like insisting that a convert on board the Arctic expedition shall be dipped through a seal-hole into polar-ice, because our Lord went down into the soft warm waters of the Jordan to receive baptism of John. Yet there are minds that would go to martyrdom for either of these imitative virtues.

Again, since in this city, where the climate favors meetings within doors, and for at least half the year forbids out-door assemblies as dangerous to health, there are provided churches, halls, lecture-rooms, saloons, of all shapes, sizes, and prices, for the accommodation of whoever may wish to preach and can get hearers, it is absurd to speak of the prohibition of street preaching on the score of public quiet and order, as an infringement upon the rights of conscience and the freedom of discussion.

If Gavazzi hires Metropolitan Hall, and there denounces the Pope as the first child of the Devil, and Archbishop Hughes as his cousin-german, nobody has any right to interfere, by word, or gesture, or act. If Archbishop Hughes in the same place denounces Protestants as infidels, and lauds both the spiritual and temporal power of the Papacy as the grand conservator of popular freedom, no man has a right there to resent the unblushing lie. If either speaker were molested, it would be the duty of the police to preserve order, and to maintain the right of free speech even at the point of the bayonet. But if either of these gentlemen should attempt to enlighten the public in front of Metropolitan Hall, it would be the duty of the police to disperse the crowd, and if the speaker persisted, to arrest him for a breach of the peace. We go to the death for free discussion where free discussion belongs; but to obstruct the thoroughfares of a populous and busy city is a nuisance—an injury to business, to property, and perhaps to life—that cannot be tolerated, whether from a political speaker, a temperance lecturer, a crier of razor-strops and envelops, an organ-grinder, or a preacher of the Gospel. Freedom of locomotion is a right as well as freedom of speech.

Separating Slave Families.—The Richmond Enquirer is down on the Governor of Alabama for venturing to suggest, in a message to the Legislature, the enactment of a law to prevent the separation of husband from wife and parent from children in the sale of slaves. It says:—

"This recommendation strikes us as being most unwise and impolitic. If slaves are property, then should they be at the absolute disposal of the master, or be subject only to such legal provisions as are designed for the protection of life and limb. If the relation of master and slave be infringed for one purpose, it would be difficult to fix any limit to the encroachment. If the slaveholder yield one point to the demands of Abolition fanaticism, he will but embolden the spirit which he aims to conciliate, and will be driven to some more substantial concession."

Bequest.—Mr. Thomas Hanna, who died lately at Pittsburgh, Pa., gave $1,000 each to the Bible, Tract, and Colonization Societies, the Foreign Missions and Home Missions of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, and to the Western Theological Seminary. He then directed that the remainder of his property—about $600,000—should be divided into seven equal parts—an equal portion of which was bequeathed to each of his six children. The remaining part was left to the Presbytery of Monongahela of the Associate Reformed Church, with full power to devote it to objects of benevolence, not overlooking the Theological Seminary or the missionary cause.

Consoling, very.—Under the head of "Mistake," the N. Y. Tribune of Dec. 23d says:—

"W. S. writes us that he lately sent us a dollar (as a subscription) and a communication for our columns—that the dollar was retained and the paper sent, but the article not printed—wherefrom he concludes that 'money is in better demand in your market than brains.' If that were true, it would not be amazing, as Editors are supposed to have more brains than money; but his conclusion is not justified by his premises. The money was genuine; the brains bogus."

Sailing of Missionaries.—The bark Lyman, for Calcutta, sailed from Boston on Monday, Dec. 12, having on board as passengers, Rev. J. L. Douglass, formerly pastor of the Baptist church in Fort Ann, N. Y., and Rev. A. R. R. Crawley, of Nova Scotia, and a graduate of Newton Theological Institution, Missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union to Burmah.

The Congregational Journal finds pleasure in the fact "of a growing conviction in the churches, of the necessity of increasing the support of their pastors, when the cost of the means of living has so perceptibly advanced. The Pearl Street church in Nashua voluntarily offered their minister, Rev. Mr. Adams, a salary of $1200, which, we believe, is the largest paid in the State. The Congregational society in Quincy, Mass., recently added $200 to the salary of their minister, Rev. Nelson Clark, with great unanimity."

At a meeting of the Manchester Bible Society, the Earl of Shaftesbury stated that he had recently learned, that of the 350 pickpockets and burglars, at a meeting of whom, in London, he some time since presided, only fifty were now pursuing those callings. The reformation of the remainder had been effected by the Bible in the hands of a very humble man.

The friends of the Theological Seminary of Virginia will be glad to learn that the late Rev. James W. Cooke, the Secretary for Foreign Missions, left by will his library of about 1000 volumes to the Seminary. The books are valuable, and just such as the students most need.

The Rev. R. G. Burleson, of Texas, who was appointed one of the Vice-Presidents of the American Bible Union declines the honor. He says: "After examining the question on both sides, and in all its bearings, I am profoundly penetrated with the conviction, that its origin, progress, and results, are full of mischief and evil to our churches."

It is stated that thirty-nine Roman Catholics have publicly joined the National Church of Geneva; this was the result of a course of lectures on the errors of Popery, given by ministers of the Reformed faith, during last winter.

It is proposed to commence a Religious Newspaper in Oregon, entitled the North Pacific Christian Advocate, about the 1st of March next.

The fund collected for the benefit of the Madiai Family is to be invested in a government annuity on the joint lives of Francesco and Rosa Madiai, and on that of the survivor.

The death of Rev. Dr. Symington, of Paisley, known as the author of a work on the Atonement, is announced in the foreign papers.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 19.

In the SENATE, Senator Norris, of New Hampshire, announced the death of his colleague, the Hon. Ingraham's action with regard to Koszta, and in unqualified reprobation of the conduct of our Government in upholding Slavery at the same time that it professes devotion to Liberty. Mr. Preston of Ky. responded, advocating Slavery as a humane, politic, and Christian contrivance—until God shall see fit to abolish it.

Mr. Orr submitted a resolution of inquiry relative to the books printed by the order of Congress, the number of those already finished, and the progress of those still in course of completion, which was adopted. Mr. Phillips introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the propriety and expediency of continuing the completion of such river and harbor improvements as were appropriated for at the last session of Congress, which was adopted. After a short discussion, on a motion to reconsider the vote, Mr. Dean made a reply to the remarks of Mr. Gerrit Smith.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 22.

The Chair then presented a letter from the Managers of the Industrial Exhibition of New York, inviting the Senate to attend the same. The Senate adjourned until Third-day.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Speaker presented a communication from the Clerk, stating that certain documents voted by last Congress for distribution among the people, have been published, and that since the adjournment of last Congress, and after the expiration of the franking privilege of the Members of that Congress, a question has arisen as to whether Members of the present Congress shall distribute them, and asking to be relieved from the embarrassment. It was then ordered, that those documents be delivered to Members of the present Congress for distribution. The House went into a Committee of the Whole, and continued the debate of yesterday—Mr. Phelps of Mo., and Mr. Bayly of Va., successively taking the floor. The Speaker then laid before the House a letter inviting the Members of Congress to visit the Crystal Palace; after which the House adjourned until Third-day.

California News.

The steamer Northern Light, from San Juan, arrived at New York on the 24th inst., with California dates to the 1st, 526 passengers, and $1,500,000 in specie on freight. We give below the principal items of news for two weeks, copied from the San Francisco Herald:—

The expedition which we noticed in our last summary as fitting out in our State, for the purpose of exploring the auriferous regions of the Amazon, seems to have made no progress, and the excitement has in a great measure died away. The "sober second thoughts" have divested the enterprise of many of its charms, and it has been found upon examination to possess much less of romance than was at first supposed.

Mining accounts from all parts of the State continue favorable. The rises in the different streams, caused by the recent rains, have, however, produced a change in the fields of operation. In many places, flumes, dams, and machinery, have been swept away, occasioning heavy losses, and putting an immediate termination to all operations in the river beds and along the sides. The miners have therefore been compelled to abandon these localities for the winter, and seek other diggings among the gulches which have heretofore been dry and not in working order. In the hitherto abandoned sections, the harvest is just commencing.

The last of the immigrants by the Southern, or Gila route, have arrived. They bring with them a large number of sheep, cows, and other stock. The Yumas were quiet and apparently friendly.

Snow has fallen in the mountains, and the northern part of the State has been visited by frost.

The Indians in the North have again been subjected to outrages and wrongs at the hands of the whites. A few days since, two of those unfortunate creatures were killed by mistake—upon a subsequent examination it having been made to appear that they had not committed the offenses attributed to them.

The Utah Indians have been committing a series of depredations in the southern portion of the State.

The Chinese of San Francisco have donated $1,000 to Capt. Love's Rangers, for their services in capturing the bandit Joaquin.

From Oregon the dates are to Nov. 19:

A murder was committed in the southern part of the territory by an Indian, but upon a demand, he was surrendered by the chief of the tribe, in conformity with the treaty. In another place the whites and the Indians have had a battle, and it is feared that there will be another general Indian war.

The Cape Flattery Indians have been committing depredations in Washington Territory.

The business of Olympia is said to be very brisk.

In attempting to arrest an Indian, who had murdered a white man near Port Townsend, a fight took place between the settlers and the Indians, in which one of the former and several of the latter were wounded. The culprit, after some delay, was captured.

Our dates from the Sandwich Islands are to the 5th of November. Up to that date one hundred and twelve whalers had arrived at Honolulu, Lahina and Hilo.

Honolulu is said to be free from small-pox, but the disease is carrying off many of the natives in the rural portions of the Islands.

Hawaiian Missionaries have been dispatched to the Marquesas Islands to convert the natives.

In politics a calm seems to have followed the storm, although the approaching election is beginning to excite attention. Free Trade and annexation to the United States are warmly advocated by the Liberal party.

European News.

The steamer America, with one week later dates from Europe, arrived at Boston Dec. 24th.

From the East the news is still favorable to the Turkish arms. No new conflicts have taken place in Europe, but in Asia they have captured several more Russian fortresses, repulsed an attempt to retake the fort of St. Nicholas, and come off victors in one or two minor engagements in the field. Their main body, under Abdi Pasha, was marching against Tiflis, the capital of the Russian province of Georgia, and we must soon hear of decisive fighting in that quarter. Meanwhile hostilities are suspended on the Danube, and strenuous efforts for peace are about to be put forth by the Western Powers.

The weather in England and France had been very foggy.

Five men, rescued from the wreck of the Hyperion, had arrived at London. They were brought in by ship Edward Everett. Eight of their companions were lost.

Cases of cholera are quite frequent in Paris.

At Rome twenty young men have been arrested on a charge of belonging to a London secret society.

An Æronaut from Rome had been frozen to death in a balloon.

The religious question in England keeps men's minds in agitation. Lord Palmerston lately took a bold step against Puseyism, by refusing to advise the Queen to issue a "Queen's Letter" for the Society for Propagating the Gospel, which is Puseyite to the core. He yielded at last to the solicitations of Mr. Gladstone and the Duke of Newcastle, but only for the present year, as it would be unjust so abruptly to cut off the revenues of the Society; but it has been openly declared that this is to be the last Queen's Letter to be granted.

The British Government has published the official dispatches received from Admiral Moresby, commanding in the Pacific, relative to the quantity of Peruvian Guano remaining at the Chincha Islands. The quantity estimated to be available, after a careful examination, is 8,600,000 tuns, but the Admiral affirms that the Islands will be exhausted of the guano that would be saleable in the English market, and that would be worth paying freight for, in 8 or 9 years. The Peruvian Government, on the other hand, had stated the quantity remaining to be equal to 25,000,000 tuns.

Among the news from Europe a striking feature is the rumor concerning the fall and disgrace of Prince Menchikoff, with whom it may be said the whole Turkish quarrel originated. Should this prove true, it would point to a complete change in the policy pursued by the Czar, as well as indicate the downfall of the ultra-orthodox party in Russia, of which Menchikoff has been the leader since the war of 1828.

The loss of the steamship Marshall, from Hamburg, bound to Hull, is confirmed. One hundred and seventy lives are supposed to have been lost.

Four Days Later Important.

The steamer Pacific arrived at New York on the 26th inst., bringing four days later news—news which changes the whole aspect of affairs, and renders probable a general war in Europe.

One account says that on the 30th of November, the Russian Admiral Nachirnoff, or Machinoff, with six ships of the line, appeared off the Roads of Sinope, and forthwith proceeded to attack the Turkish force that he found there After an engagement of one hour's duration he had destroyed seven Turkish frigates, two corvettes, one steamer, and three transports. The larger vessels destroyed had each 800 soldiers besides artillerymen on board, and a large sum of money, being bound for the east coast of the Black Sea. The Turkish Admiral's frigate was towed out by the Russians, but burnt at sea. Osman Pasha and his suite were taken on board the Russian Admiral's ship. One Turkish vessel managed to escape undamaged, being the only survivor of the 14. The battle, says the dispatch, begun an hour's distance from Sinope. The Russian flag-ship was so much injured that it could with difficulty reach Sebastopol.

Another account says that the Russien force considerably outnumbered the Turkish. In addition to the six ships of the line mentioned as the strength of Nachiroft's fleet, he had twelve frigates, a brig, and five steamers, in all twenty-four sail, while Osman had but fourteen. The Turks fought with the most desperate bravery, and caused the Russians the loss, in sunk and burned, of two ships of the line, three frigates and two steamboats! The remaining Russian ships were so badly disabled that they could take no prizes, and could with difficulty make their way back to Sebastopol.

WRECK OF A BRITISH SHIP AND LOSS OF OVER TWO HUNDRED LIVES.—From English papers we learn that the wreck of the British ship Lady Evelyn, Capt. M'Clellen, while on a voyage from Hong Kong to San Francisco, had been announced at Lloyd's. The Lady Evelyn sailed from Hong Kong on the 29th of June, with a cargo of merchandise and 220 emigrants. Among the passengers was Major Poore, of Indian Hill Farm. On the 19th of July, the ship, in a heavy gale, went on a reef known as Richard Rocks, off the south-east end of Tyfrosian, one of the Madjiscosema group of islands, and after thumping a while broke in two just abaft the mainmast. In a moment the stern and after part of the ship drifted away, loaded with human beings, not one of whom escaped. About 30 of the passengers took to the fore-rigging, and finally reached the shore, whence they were rescued.

SUMMARY.

The Great Western Railway is now open from London to Niagara Falls, a distance of 119 miles. A great demonstration took place at London on Thursday, when the cars made their first trip. All along the line the inhabitants had congregated to witness the advent of the iron horse, and at several places refreshments were provided, of which champagne formed an important item. At London the cars were met by a large concourse of citizens, a procession was formed which proceeded to the Court House, where several addresses were delivered. In the evening there was a public dinner, and the embryo city was brilliantly illuminated with bonfires.

Benjamin Buckingham of Northville, (New Milford,) was found dead in a cave on the mountains near that place, last week. The deceased was among the first of the California adventurers, and returned with some $50,000. He again visited the land of gold, where he lost his property, and since his arrival home, a year since, has appeared rather depressed in spirits. He had been absent from his boarding place about two weeks, when search was made and his body found as above. A revolver was by his side, with one barrel empty, the charge having passed through his head. His age was about 27.

On Friday last, says the Boston Traveler of Dec. 22d, the ship Abby Pratt, from Calcutta for Boston, went ashore on Nantucket Shoals, and was abandoned by her officers and crew, who proceeded to Nantucket for assistance. A steamer was procured, and several boats started on their own hook, with the hope of obtaining salvage; but up to yesterday the most diligent search had failed to discover this rich waif, which probably floated off after being abandoned, and is either adrift upon the waters, or has sunk to the bottom. The ship and cargo were worth probably $250,000.

Bayard Taylor, a traveling editor of the N. Y. Tribune, returned last week from a long tour. He left New York on the 28th of August, 1851, and has been gone two years and four months. In this time he has visited most of the countries of Europe, has ascended the Nile further than any other American or English traveler, journeyed in Palestine, Asia Minor and India, visited China twice and taken part in the American Expedition to Japan. He has traveled altogether some fifty thousand miles.

In the Supreme Court at Boston, in the case of James Mitchell vs. the Boston and Worcester Railroad, the Jury, after being out all night, returned a verdict for defendants. This was a suit brought by plaintiff, a brakeman in the employ of defendants, for $5,000 damages for the loss of one leg at the knee by falling from a freight train while in motion, which accident he alleged was in consequence of the negligence of defendants in not providing suitable ladders for him to pass over the tops of the cars.

The Albany Atlas of Dec. 21, says:—We may now announce the close of river navigation. This morning the river was covered with a sheet of formidable ice, and there were no arrivals of boats. Although the river remained open to the 24th of December in the year 1847, and to the 27th in '49, and to the 22d in '52, no season during the past ten years shows so long a period of navigation as the one just closed. Navigation commenced on the 21st of March, and closed on the 21st of December—nine months, or 275 days!

A dispatch dated Charleston, Thursday, Dec. 22, 1853, says:—The steamer Marlborough, when on the point of starting, at 8 o'clock this morning, for Cheraw and other landings on the Pedee River, with an assorted cargo, exploded her boiler, instantly killing the Captain, W. M. Smallwood, the mate, Mr. Bullen, formerly the Captain of the bark Saranak; the Chief Engineer, Warren Stone, and, it is said, twelve out of the fifteen hands on board.

As Miss Jane M. Tripp, of North Providence, R. I., was riding in a chaise near Gen. Hawe's place, about sunset, a man came out from the woods, seized her horse, and demanded her money. The rascal got only about a dollar in change, although the lady had a considerable sum with her.

Rewards of Authorship.

A work on International Copyright, written by H. C. Carey, (in which he argues against the proposed treaty,) has recently been published, and [illegible] much information relative to the rewards of authorship, in Great Britain and America.

In regard to the poverty of English writers, Mr. Carey says:—

"Mrs. Inchbald, so well known as the author of the Simple Story, and other novels, as well as in her capacity of editor, dragged on, as we are told, to the age of sixty, a miserable existence, living always in mean lodgings, and suffering frequently from want of the common comforts of life. Lady Morgan, so well known as Miss Owenson, a brilliant and accomplished woman, is now dependent altogether upon the public charity, administered in the form of a pension of less than five hundred dollars a year. Mrs. Hemans, the universally admired poetess, lived and died in poverty. Laman Blanchard lost his senses and committed suicide in consequence of being compelled, by his extreme poverty, to the effort of writing an article for a periodical while his wife lay a corpse in the house. Miss Mitford, so well known to all of us, found herself, after a life of close economy, so greatly reduced, as to have been under the necessity of applying to her American readers for means to extricate her little property from the rude hands of the Sheriff. Like Lady Morgan, she is now a public pensioner. Leigh Hunt is likewise dependent upon the public charity. Tom Hood, so well known by his Song of a Shirt—the delight of his readers, and a mine of wealth to his publishers; a man without vices, and of untiring industry—lived always from day to day on the produce of his labor. On his death-bed, when his lungs were so worn with consumption that he could breathe only through a silver tube, he was obliged to be propped up with pillows, and, with shaking hand and dizzy head, force himself to the task of amusing his readers, that he might thereby obtain bread for his unhappy wife and children. With all his reputation, Moore found it difficult to support his family, and all the comfort of his declining years was due to the charity of his friend Lord Lansdowne. In one of his letters from Germany, Campbell expresses himself transported with joy at hearing that a double edition of his poems had just been published in London. "This unexpected fifty pounds," says he, "saves me from jail." Haynes Bayley died in extreme poverty. Similar statements are furnished us in relation to numerous others who have, by the use of their pens, largely contributed to the enjoyment and the instruction of the people of Great Britain. It would, indeed, be difficult to find very many cases in which it had been otherwise with persons exclusively dependent on the produce of literary labor. With few and brilliant exceptions, their condition appears to have been, and to be, one of almost hopeless poverty. Scarcely anything short of this, indeed, would induce the acceptance of the public charity that is occasionally doled out in the form of pensions on the literary fund.

In regard to the amount received by successful American authors, Mr. Carey makes some statements, which will be new to most readers:—

I have now before me a statement from a single publisher, in which he says that to Messrs. Willis, Longfellow, Bryant, and Alston, his price was uniformly $50 for a poetical article, long or short—and his readers know that they were generally very short; in one case only fourteen lines. To numerous others it was from $25 to $40. In one case he has paid $20 per page for prose. To Mr. Cooper he paid $1,800 for a novel, and $1,000 for a series of naval biographies, the author retaining the copy-right for separate publication; and in such cases, if the work be good, its appearance in the magazine acts as the best of advertisements. To Mr. James he paid $1,200 for a novel, leaving him also the copy-right. For a single number of his journal he has paid to authors $1,500. The total amount paid for original matter by two magazines—the selling price of which is $3 per annum—in ten years, has exceeded $130,000, giving an average of $13,000 per annum. The Messrs. Harper inform me that the expenditure for literary and artistic labor required for their magazine is $2,000 per month, or $24,000 a year.

Passing upward, we reach the producers of books, and here we find rewards not, I believe, to be paralleled elsewhere. Mr. Irving stands, I imagine, at the head of living authors for the amount received for his books. The sums paid to the renowned Peter Parley must have been enormously great, but what has been their extent I have no means of ascertaining. Mr. Mitchell, the geographer, has realized a handsome fortune from his school books. Professor Davies is understood to have received more than $50,000 from the series published by him. The Abbots, Emerson, and numerous others engaged in the preparation of books for young persons and schools, are largely paid. Professor Anthon, we are informed, has received more than $60,000 for his series of classics. The French series of Mr. Bolmar has yielded him upward of $20,000. The school geography of Mr. Morse is stated to have yielded more than $20,000 to the author. A single medical book, of one 8vo. volume, is understood to have produced its authors $60,000, and a series of medical books has given to its author probably $30,000. Mr. Downing's receipts from his books have been very large. The two works of Miss Warner must have already yielded her from $12,000 to $15,000, and perhaps much more. Mr. Headley is stated to have received about $40,000; and the few books of Ike Marvel have yielded him about $20,000; a single one, The Reveries of a Bachelor, produced more than $4,000 in the first six months. Mrs. Stowe has been very largely paid. Miss Leslie's Cookery and Receipt books have paid her $12,000. Dr. Barnes is stated to have received more than $30,000 for the copy-right of his religious works. Fanny Fern has probably received not less than $6,000 for the 12mo. volume published but six months since. Mr. Prescott was stated, several years since, to have then received $90,000 from his books, and I have never seen it contradicted. According to the rate of compensation generally understood to be received by Mr. Bancroft, the present sale of each volume of his yields him more than $15,000, and he has the long period of forty-two years for future sale. Judge Story died, as has been stated, in the receipt of more than $8,000 per annum; and the amount has not, as it is understood, diminished. Mr. Webster's works, in three years, can scarcely have paid less than $25,000. Kent's Commentaries are understood to have yielded to their author and his heirs more than $120,000, and if we add to this for the remainder of the period only one half of this sum, we shall obtain $180,000, or $45,000 as the compensation for a single 8vo. volume, a reward for literary labor unexampled in history. What has been the amount received by Professor Greenleaf I cannot learn, but his work stands second only, in the legal line, to that of Chancellor Kent. The price paid for Webster's 8vo. Dictionary is understood to be fifty cents per copy; and if so, with a sale of 250,000, it must already have reached $125,000. If now to this we add the quarto, at only a dollar a copy, we shall have a sum approaching to, and perhaps exceeding, $180,000; more, probably, than has been paid for all the dictionaries of Europe in the same period of time. What have been the prices paid to Messrs. Hawthorne, Longfellow, Bryant, Willis, Curtis, and numerous others, I cannot say; but it is well known that they have been very large. It is not, however, only the few who are liberally paid; all are so who manifest any ability.

Bishop Burgess on the Maine Law.

The following letter is from Bishop Burgess, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maine. The authority is of the very best kind, and we think no one will call in question the statements in the letter. We copy from the Family Visitor for October.

GARDINER, Me., August 22, 1853.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—To your queries I reply briefly, in their order.

Q. 1. Did this prohibitory law originate in the scheme of politicians for other purposes, or did it stand in the Legislature upon its own merits?

A. I have very little knowledge of the operations of politicians amongst us; and, undoubtedly, individual leaders or others, members of parties, may have been influenced by their political interests in sustaining or opposing this measure. But I suppose that, beyond all question, the law originated with persons who were solely concerned for the suppression of intemperance; and that it was passed only because it was believed to be demanded by a great majority of the people, for its own merits.

Q. 2. Has it justified the expectations entertained of it by its friends at the time of its passage?

A. What were their actual expectations, I cannot venture to say; but every reasonable expectation must have been more than satisfied. Whatever it is in the power of a prohibitory law to accomplish without extreme severity or inquisitorial scrutiny, this law has generally, in my opinion, accomplished. Those who are bent upon obtaining liquor can and do succeed; but it has ceased to be an article of traffic; it has ceased to present any open temptation; the young are comparatively safe; and all the evils of public drinking shops and bars are removed, together with the interest of a large body of men in upholding them for their own pecuniary advantage.

Q. 3. Have there been any reactions in public opinion, so as to induce the belief that at a future day it might be repealed?

A. In my opinion quite the contrary. Should the law be repealed, which seems in the highest degree improbable, it will be the result merely of political arrangements; but I do not believe that any political party would venture on a measure so hazardous to its own prospects. Undoubtedly many discreet and conscientious persons saw strong objections to some features of the law, and still feel their force. But multitudes who doubted the expediency of adopting it, would, I believe, regret and resist its repeal.

Q. 4. Has the law been generally executed, and the amount of intoxication been speedily diminished in the State in consequence?

A. The law has been, I believe, generally executed; though not every where with equal energy; and the amount of intoxication has been, in consequence, most evidently, strikingly, and even, I think I may say, wonderfully diminished.

Q. 5. Has the health, wealth, morality, and general prosperity of the State been apparently promoted by it?

A. Unquestionably.

Q. 6. Has the law been found in its operation to be oppressive to any citizens not guilty of its violation?

A. So far as I know, not in the least.

In thus answering your inquiries, I would avoid everything like the intrusion of an opinion respecting the practicability or wisdom of such a measure elsewhere. I never appeared here as its public advocate; and I am not blind to such arguments as may be urged against legislation which, though it is peculiarly humane in its operation upon persons, is so sweeping with reference to things. Nevertheless I am most devoutly grateful for the practical working of the law; and believe that to every family in Maine it is of more value than can easily be computed.

I am, very faithfully, your friend and brother, GEORGE BURGESS.

Important to Honey-Makers.

We observe that chloroform has been applied instead of sulphur to bees. A correspondent of the Edinburgh Evening Courant has adopted this plan successfully, and publishes his discovery:—

"The quantity of chloroform required for an ordinary hive is the sixth part of an ounce; a very large hive may take nearly a quarter of an ounce. My mode of operation is as follows:—I set down a table opposite to, and about four feet distant from the hive; on the table I spread a thick linen cloth; in the center of the table I place a small shallow breakfast plate, which I cover with a piece of wire guaze to prevent the bees from coming in immediate contact with the chloroform. I now quickly and cautiously lift the hive from the board on which it is standing, set it down on the top of the table, keeping the plate in the center; cover the hive closely with cloths, and in twenty minutes or so, the bees are not only sound asleep, but, contrary to what I have seen when they are suffocated with sulphur, not one is left among the combs; the whole of them are lying helpless on the table. You now remove what honey you think fit, replace the hive in its old stand, and the bees, as they recover, will return to their domicil. A bright, calm, sunny day is the best; and you should commence your operations in the morning, before many of them are abroad."

The Moquis.

Far away beyond the South Pass, on the head waters of Gila River, lives John Bridger, a trapper of the plains and mountains for more than 40 years. It is admitted by all trappers that he is better acquainted than any living man with the intricacies of all the hills and streams that lose themselves in the great basins. While trapping on the tributaries of the Colorado, an Indian offered to guide Mr. Bridger and party to a people living far up the desert, with whom he could barter.

The proposition was accepted; and after providing themselves with dried meats and water, they struck right out into the heart of that great desert, where no white man has before or since trodden, and which the hardy mountaineers will only venture to skirt. After five days' travel the party arrived at three mountains, or buttes, rising in grandeur in that solitary waste. These mountains were covered with a diversity of forest and fruit trees, with streams of the purest water rippling down their declivities. At their base was a numerous agricultural people, surrounded with waving fields of corn and a profusion of vegetables. The people were dressed in leather; they knew nothing of fire-arms, using only the bow and arrow; and for mile after mile, circling those buttes, were adobe houses two and three stories high. Mr. Bridger was not allowed to enter any of their towns or houses, and after remaining three days, bartering scarlet cloth and iron for their furs, he left them; not, however, before being given to understand that they had no communication beyond their desert home. That these are the people that once inhabited the banks of the Gila and Colorado, and left these monuments of wonder, the "Casse Grand," which so deeply attracted the followers of Fremont and Doniphan, and then vanished like a dream, there can no longer be a doubt.

China.

The Chinese are, especially with reference to the past, emphatically a great people. When England was a mixture of swamp and forest, the kingdom of China was covered with towns and cities in a state of complete political and municipal government. When the ancient Britons wore paint, and huddled themselves together under wicker-work huts, the Chinese dressed in silk, and resided in palaces. While many of the European rivers had yet to be explored, China was intersected with canals, bearing travelers and merchandise on their waters from the Yellow Sea to countries beyond the Great Wall. While the wisest of the Grecians believed in soothsayers and drew auguries from the stars, the Chinese studied astronomy, and computed the annual orbit of the earth; when nobody in Europe could read but monks, the city of Nankin was daily placarded with advertisements of books, and bills of popular plays—plays, the success of which puts to shame the boasts of European managers; for some of them have run, not hundreds of nights but hundreds of years; many being performed, we will venture to assert, at the same moment that some of our readers scan these lines. When the most that could be done here in foreign commerce was to sell a little Cornish tin to the Phœnicians, the Chinese supplied the whole of India with luxuries, and had invented printing, gunpowder, the mariner's compass and bank notes. Those, again, who have studied the government policy of the Chinese, declare it to be, theoretically (but only in theory,) as near perfection as is conceivable. The country is ruled, down to the minutest details and observances of private life, not by a dynasty of tyrants, nor by this or that political faction, but according to the written laws of their sages. By these laws every sort of power in China is limited and checked. The Chinese originated what Sydney Smith expressed such a horror of—select committees. Every department of the state is governed by a board—the army, the navy, the law, &c. China is the only nation upon earth which, repudiating the idea of hereditary legislators, professes to admit no one to the ranks of the noble who has not earned his nobility by learning—that is to say, by a knowledge of the laws, precepts, and general literature of their classical sages. The son of the Emperor himself, while his father lives, has no higher rank than the meanest tracker on a canal, until he has earned rank at school. The consequence is, that—to borrow a sentence from Gutzlaff—there are in China more books, and more people who can read them, than in any other nation under the sun.

Vanity may, therefore, be an excusable foible in a nation which achieved so much while the rest of the world was in a state of barbarism. But, unhappily, the vanity of the Celestials (as they are so good as to call themselves) is so thoroughly national, and so intense, that the first and fastest article of their creed is that they are perfect. They say, The institutions and precepts of our ancient sages have made us what we are—perfect; consequently, to believe for an instant in anything different from what we find in our books and institutions is simply insanity; and to put a grain of faith in the possibility of improvement is flat blasphemy. Hence, originality in a Chinese is a crime actually punishable with death. Watt, Arkwright, and Professor Wheatstone, would inevitably have suffered the extreme penalty of the law had they invented the steam engine, the spinning jenny or the electric telegraph in China. Those "men made perfect," their sages have (they say) laid down the limit to invention, and everything new must be wrong. Conservative content has for several thousand years been the religion of China. For that reason they have shut up every avenue from the outer world. For any native to leave the country, or any foreigner to enter it, was death by the law. The nation walled itself up in the bliss of ignorance. Nothing that they could see or be told could benefit them, even if it were not a crime to learn it.

This lasted up to 1842, when the war with Great Britain took place. In that year two things were proved to all intelligent Chinese: First, that they were not invincible; secondly, that after the most rigid researches in the books of their sages, no authority whatever for the ships which steamed up their rivers to go against wind and tide, and without sails, could be found. Yet, there they were, darting about under perfect control, "are devils as they were." Neither had their classics accounted for a great many other things which our army and navy introduced to their notice. Did they dream, or were their sages wrong? The latter conviction is slowly stealing on them.

The events of the past year have proved that what we showed to the Chinese on that occasion was not shown in vain. It would have been a miracle if the steamboat, improved fire arms, and other astonishing Western inventions, had been exhibited to an eminently literary and thinking people, without their finding out that their sages had erred in not providing better for the future. They have manifestly, during the last ten years, been losing faith in the infallibility of their ancient wise men. Add to this, the government having become embarrassed for money, has departed more glaringly than its predecessors had done (for the laws of China were never exempt from the great evil of evasion) from the honest plan of promoting merit, and adopted the pernicious abuse of selling offices. Meanwhile the extreme pressure of population meeting diminished means of existence, and both happening coincidently with the discovery of gold on the opposite coast of the Pacific, induced vast numbers of Chinese to break their law by emigrating. Discontent and disorganization have been the natural consequences of these events, and any sort of rebels have been welcomed—whether members of the Triad of Lily secret societies, the banditti from the western mountainous districts, or the half Christian leader, who has headed and is evidently consolidating the revolt. Sketch of a Business Man.

Anson G. Phelps, recently deceased, bequeathed over half a million dollars to benevolent objects. Of the business transactions by which his large fortune was accumulated, we find the following account in one of our exchanges:—

Anson Green Phelps, Esq., was born in Simsbury, Conn., in the year 1780, and at an early age learned the saddler's trade of his elder brother, Thomas Woodbridge Phelps, in that place. On arriving at his majority he went to the South, where he spent some two or three years at his business. Subsequently he went to Hartford, Conn., and established himself in business, and married an estimable young lady, Miss Olivia Eggleston. He had connected himself with the first congregational church in Hartford, under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Nathan Strong, and up to this time took a great interest in religious matters. Eventually, in 1815, he came to this city, and established himself as a dealer in tin plate and heavy metals. He was extremely successful, and continued to extend his commercial transactions largely. It will be recollected that in the year 1832 a most sad incident occurred, which nearly resulted in depriving the community of their benefactor and friend. The store of the firm situate, at the corner of Cliff and Fulton streets, fell with a terrific crash in the middle of the day, when the hands were at work, Mr. Phelps having gone to attend a meeting of the Bible Society. That Society was to have met in the very store at that particular critical moment; but in consequence of some interfering circumstance the meeting was appointed at another place. Unfortunately, as it were, nine persons were killed, but had the members of the Society been there, the loss of life would have been appalling. The only cause which could be assigned for this melancholy catastrophe was, that the superincumbent weight of heavy metals and cotton on the upper floors was too great for the strength of the building and its supports. The store was afterwards rebuilt, but the firm changed the locality of their store, and removed further down Cliff street. Subseqently a dissolution in the firm took place. Mr. Peck retired, and Mr. Phelps took in his sons-in-law, Mr. Dodge and Mr. James, the firm assuming the title of "Phelps, Dodge, & Co." He afterwards took in his only son, Anson G. Phelps.

After the formation of the new firm they established a branch house at Liverpool, which at present is carried on by one of the partners. They then commenced the manufacture of wire at Haverstraw, and subsequently established copper mills at Birmingham, Conn. Mr. Phelps gave lots for the erection of churches of various denominations, and he owned very considerable lands around. From the successful results of his energetic operations in that quarter, other manufacturers were induced to follow in his track, and ultimately Birmingham became most conspicuous as a manufacturing town. Such was the appreciation of its residents of the enterprise of Mr. Phelps, that they named the best streets after his family, appropriating to them their Christian names. He then, with his water-power, established, in connection with other parties, a brass mill for the manufacture of kettles and other articles; and from the successful manner in which he carried on his operations, and the stimulus given thereby to the progress of the spot, grew up the now manufacturing village of Ansonia. He went largely into the purchase of real estate in this city, in the neighborhood of 30th street, 4th and 5th avenues, and about the vicinity of Kip's Bay. His speculations were so numerous that it would be a herculean task to enumerate them.

Fruit Trees.

If fruit dwindles in size, and becomes defective and knotty, a scientific farmer knows that the earth needs phosphate of lime, one of the most necessary ingredients to a full and perfect development of fruit.

The scientific farmer would then gather leaves and burn or pulverize them, and after digging round his trees so as to expose their roots, put half a bushel of bone dust, leaves and leached ashes, mixed in equal portions, to each tree, and thus afford materials for a perfect development of the fruit.

If peach trees dwindle, the leaves crisp, and curl up, or in other words have the yellows, they need iron. A man may as well live without breath, as a peach tree without iron. If the ground does not naturally furnish it, the owner must, or be disappointed in his hope of fruit. In such a case, go to the smith, or machine shop, and get the scales, or what is better, the iron turnings, and digging away around the roots, so as to expose them, apply one quart of scoriæ, or scales or turnings, to each tree, a pint of salt, and a peck of leached ashes, and the curled leaves will give place to delicious fruit.

The yellows in the peach tree, is the same as the yellow water in the horse; both arise from a want of iron. Infuse that into the system, to act as a receiver of the electricity, and the yellow water in a horse, and the yellows in the peach tree are matters of history. [Ohio Farmer.

Application to business is worth more in this country than to be born the heir to a fortune, for he who struggles to achieve a competence, learns at the same time how to retain it.

VARIETY.

An exchange tells the following anecdote of a Wisconsin lawyer, of superior natural talents, but rather deficient in early education. On one occasion he was attempting to fasten the charge of fraud upon an opponent, "Yes, gentlemen," said he, "this whole transaction appears to me to be a fraudulent one. Upon every event in its whole course, I see written the word fraud. Aye, gentlemen, and upon that plaintiff's brow, (pointing fiercely at the meek-looking gentleman,) clear as the light of noon-day, I see written in characters of blackest dye—F-R-O-A-D."

Benjamin Smith, of Batavia, Ill., has invented certain improvements in reaping machines, on which he has applied for a patent. The invention consists in a new mode of elevating or depressing the sickle-bar, by means of which it is enabled to pass over any obstructions, and also in the employment of a pressure roller to prevent the grain or grass of an adjoining swath from being drawn into the fingers by the sickles. The sickle-bar is also peculiarly constructed, and a friction roller is attached to the connecting rod for the purpose of diminishing friction and ensuring a steady movement of the knives.

A London paper states that a new method of painting has been discovered and employed by Horace Vernet. It consists in 'mixing the colors with olive oil. When the picture is painted, the back of the canvas is covered with a coating of fuller's earth, which draws the oil through and absorbs it entirely. The painting is thus reduced to the nature of a paste. The fuller's earth is then removed from the canvas, and a coat of linseed oil is applied—always at the back. The colors, in their turn, imbibe this oil, and all the mellowed tones of the old masters are obtained.'

There is a man living in Constantia, Oswego County, named Bentley, aged 103 years, who is mentally and physically as fresh and sprightly as most men of middle age. From his appearance, no one would suppose him to be more than 50 or 60 years old. He has a family of 13 children, all of whom are at present living—the eldest about 75 years, and the youngest nearly 40. The family are all hale and hearty, and present a picture which is seldom seen. Mr. Bentley was born in Rhode Island, and was an active participant in the scenes of the Revolution.

It appears from an article in Putnam's Magazine for September, on the Salem Witchcraft, that the number of persons actually executed in the year of its occurrence, in 1692, was twenty, that eight more were under sentence of death, that 150 were in jail, and that 200 more suspected persons were at large. The spot where the delusion raged is now Danvers. By the same delusion thousands lost their lives in Scotland and on the continent.

During the last excavations made at Pompeii, several human skeletons, and one of a dog, were discovered, pressed one upon the other. Two gold rings, ornamented with cameos, were found on the fingers of the left hand of one of the skeletons. The remains of an antique villa have been discovered between Acermo and Seafati, on the banks of the Sarno, at a depth of only three or four feet under the level of the earth.

Several bank bills disappeared very mysteriously a few nights since from the coat pocket of Mr. Lamprey, of North Hampton, N. H., he having left his coat hanging upon his bed-post on retiring to bed. A morning or two afterward, Mrs. Lamprey found a mouse's nest in her oven, in which were four young mice nicely wrapped up in the missing bills.

The Journal of Commerce states that a Russian gentleman, residing in New York, had occasion, not long since, to bring to this country his overcoat, which was lined with sable, agreeable to Russian custom, and the duty assessed on it amounted to $700, the garment being appraised at something like $3000.

Tom Marshall, when Pilcher was haranguing about "his father having been a poor man; his father was a cooper," and more of that sort of thing—said, he would admit the gentleman's father was a poor man; perhaps he had been a cooper; but if he was, (pointing to Pilcher,) he had made a mighty poor head to one of his whiskey barrels!

The Iowa Reporter says the emigration into that State this year is immense. The prairies of Illinois are lined with cattle and wagons pushing on for that prosperous State. The addition to the population from September 1st to December 1st, from emigration alone, is computed at 50,000.

The whole of the Ferries now running between New York and Brooklyn have been consolidated into the Union Ferry Company, in consequence of which the Superintendent, Mr. C. J. Taylor, has notified the public that foot passengers will be charged on each Ferry the uniform fare of one cent.

Several months ago, a building in New York, the fifth story of which was overloaded with grain, fell to the ground, killing a man who was at work in the vicinity. The widow sued for damages in the loss of her husband, and obtained a verdict of $4,000.

A former Mayor of Baltimore thus explained his reasons for preferring to wear stockings with holes, to having them darned: "A hole," said he, "may be the accident of a day, and will pass upon the best gentleman, but a darn is premeditated poverty."

An application will be made at the next session of the New Jersey Legislature for the passage of a law to protect planted oysters, as other property is protected.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

REACTION OF THE CHURCHES ON THE MINISTERS.

[The following is the main part of the Address to the Baldwin Place Church and Congregation, delivered by Rev. R. W. Cushman, D. D., at the recent public recognition of Rev. Dr. Caldicott. We commend it to the special attention of all members of our churches and societies.]

The influence of the ministry upon the churches is a familiar theme; but the reaction of the churches on the ministry is less thought of, and is seldom dwelt on. Their duty to seek out the gifts among them which the Saviour calls for in the ministry is acknowledged; and they have not, generally, been backward in putting them into it. A license to preach may generally be had for the asking; the means of education are also attainable without much difficulty; and ordination follows almost as a matter of course. And this, most generally, is accompanied with induction into the pastoral office. And so is completed the investiture. Yet when all this is done, the ministry has only received its beginning. It is only at the threshold of its life, character, and power. For the church to consider her responsibility at an end, when she has taken it out of the rank of private membership, and educated it, and inducted it into its office, and thenceforth to regard herself as having filled out the whole of her creative duty, is as if the orchardist, after having planted the seed and transplanted the sapling, should leave its development to chance, where droughts might dwarf it; where tempests might rend it; where frosts might wither it, and the unseen worm at the core might rob it of its life.

The power and usefulness of the ministry, both as to measure and duration, are, to a great extent, dependent on the care and sympathy of the churches. Ministers are "men subject to like passions as" their brethren; and their energies, like those of other men, may be roused and sustained by encouragement and sympathy; or they may be repressed, benumbed or paralyzed by unjust or unkind requital. Grace may be supposed to do a great deal, to be sure, for those whose especial business it is to minister in holy things; but it is rather too much to expect that it will so overmaster all the wants and susceptibilities of their nature, as to supply the place of kindness, encouragement, affection, sympathy, and co-operation; and carry them forward, strong, cheerful, untiring, and unfaltering, to be and to do all that might have been justly expected, with proper encouragement and support.

Let two men of equal gifts, graces, and acquirements enter the ministry together. Let one of them find himself in the midst of a people who appreciate his worth and his labors, and who give him those manifestations of their regard which inspire him with confidence; which draw forth his affections, and stimulate his ambition. Let him feel, in the first place, that his office is revered, and its authority recognized; and that he is esteemed in love for his work sake, and may venture to discharge, in a proper spirit, the duties of his office—not only those of teaching, but those of admonition and government. Let him feel that the motives which animate him are understood; that his labor in study "to show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed," is appreciated; that his wants are thoughtfully cared for, and provided for; that his people have forbearance for his frailties, and sympathy for his sorrows; that his brethren are ready with their counsel in his perplexities, and their cooperation in his plans of usefulness. Let him feel that he can form his plans, and lay out his work, and look forward to the execution of enterprises for good with a cheering confidence of reaping the fields he has sown. Let him feel that the seed he scatters is not watered by his own tears alone, but that his people pray for him while he preaches; that they remember him in their closets and at their domestic altars; and that they so speak of him in their families, and in the walks of business, and in the social intercourse of life, as will open the public ear and draw the public heart to his ministry, and give him moral power with men.

While this shall be the history of the one, let the other begin his ministry with a church which fails to give him a support; and let him be obliged to struggle with poverty. Let the questions, "what shall I eat, and wherewithal shall I be clothed?" and how shall I supply myself with the means of improvement? find no quieting answer where he is; and, forcing themselves upon him with more and more urgency, oblige him to seek their solution by seeking another field. Let him even be fortunate enough to find another where the means of support are not wanting, and where he may address himself to his work without the embarrassment of poverty, but let him find his new field beset with new difficulties. Let him find that his ministry is valued not by the truth he proclaims, nor by the labor with which he prepares himself for communicating it, nor by the sentiments and motives which actuate him, but by its effect in "drawing a house;" not by its adaptation to the edification of the church, but by its effect in paying for its place of worship; and that thus his permanency, his happiness, his reputation, and his prospects for life, rest not on his merits, but on the price of pew stock. Let him feel, when he goes into his study to prepare for the pulpit, that he must consider not what is true, and pertinent to the condition of his people, but what will be acceptable; that they, instead of desiring the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby, are looking forward to the Sabbath for an entertainment. Let him find that truth, however spoken in love, may give offense; that he cannot rely either upon the authority of his office, the purity of his motives, or the benevolence of his heart, for the preservation of friendships while carrying out measures of discipline and reform—that his motives are likely to be misjudged, and his measures condemned, by those to whom he has a right to look for support. Let him see and hear, from day to day, evidences of dissatisfaction, the only means of removing which would be to be every thing to every body, or any thing but himself. Let him find that he cannot study without being complained of for neglecting his people; nor visit without censure for neglecting his study; that he can seek no enjoyment from the congenialities of social intercourse without exciting jealousies, nor relaxation in any way without animadversion upon his piety. Let him feel that his efforts to rise in his profession meet no answering sympathy from his people; that his most elaborate preparations for the pulpit gain him as little favor as his most extemporaneous effusions; and that while the productions of other men, on occasions of public interest, and especially the productions of men of other denominations, are sought and read by his people, his own are never called for; and that if he ever gains a name among men it must be without their aid. And thus let him ever feel the conviction pressing home upon his spirit, that it is useless for him to try to do any thing or be any thing; that his path of life must be a path of toil and obscurity, and that however he may seek to improve it, it will still be an uncheered path of privation and of change.

Now, how widely this supposed condition can be shown to be an actual one with our ministry, I do not undertake to say. But if, as we have supposed, of two young men of the same natural and acquired powers, the one should enter the ministry, and pass his life in it under the favorable, and the other under the unfavorable conditions supposed, who can fail to see that, while the former is growing in stature and strength, until he attains the full measure and power of his intellectual and moral manhood, the latter may be crushed and dwarfed? And while the former is exercising an influence commensurate with all the powers he possesses, the latter, discouraged and broken-spirited, may really have become incapacitated for the responsibilities and duties even of an obscure and limited sphere.

Men with whom conscience is not supreme, will, of course, be driven to turn aside from a path so obstructed and so beset with thorns. But even those with whom it is supreme, may be brought to the conviction that duty does not demand the sacrifice of life in the continuance of the struggle. How far the abandonment of the pastoral office, by ministers of our denomination, for other spheres of usefulness, and other means of livelihood, which has become so common, may be attributed to the dereliction of duty on the part of the churches, we will not undertake to decide. But one thing is certain; there must be something wrong somewhere. And, wherever it lies in the withholding from the ministry the authority, sympathy, confidence, support, and co-operation which, under the law of Christ, were its due, that people are chargeable not merely with a suicidal act, but with a flagrant wrong. Christ did not create the office to be so used; he did not call one portion of his people to labor for, and to be so requited by the other. He has more sympathy with his servants than to have made them things of convenience, and foot-balls of caprice to their brethren.

The duties, cares, and responsibilities which he has laid on them, have quite sufficient pressure for their fortitude; and they often compel them to cry out, "Who is sufficient for these things?" even when best sustained in their work by their people.

The church that withholds from the pastor whom she has called into her service, the deference which is due to the office, and the sympathies which are due to the man, is not only chargeable with the folly of depriving herself of the comfort and prosperity which the ministry might give her, but is guilty both of injustice and cruelty to him who serves her. And not only so, but she is abridging his usefulness among men, and destroying the power which Christ has put in her keeping for their salvation. This, it must be acknowledged, is "using great plainness of speech." But it is truth which needs to be spoken. Our churches are in danger of finding themselves without an adequate ministry. The complaint is becoming frequent, and is coming up from all parts of the land, that we have not ministers to meet the wants of the churches and the times; and the deficiency is becoming greater with every year. We have now literally thousands of churches without pastors. Many who have been in the pastoral office have left it for other fields of usefulness. Converted young men of talent are shunning the ministry, and giving themselves to secular pursuits. And is it because they have not grace enough to make them faithful to convictions of duty? or is it not rather because they are aware of the trials of the office? And if those trials are greater than they need be, and in effect, are desolating our pulpits, and leaving the churches without pastors, and the people without the gospel, is it not a duty to do whatever can be done to lessen them?

Of one thing I think our churches may feel well assured; that when they have done all which Christ requires of them in the way of giving honor and authority to the ministry, and all which even generosity may render to its support, and all which co-operation may give of encouragement, and all which kindness may do to smooth its path, there will still be enough of trial left, in our denomination, to protect it from the entrance of the unworthy. It has no mitres to bestow on ambition; no pluralities for avarice; no sinecures for indolence.

The young man who devotes himself to the ministry in our denomination—at least the young man who knows what he is doing, who has "sat down and counted the cost"—must calculate on a life, not of ease, but of labor—labor, not among the rich and great, but mainly among the poor; and, so far as the resources of his profession are concerned, must expect to be and remain of their number. He gives himself to the spread of a doctrine that is "everywhere spoken against;" and must expect to find, wherever his lot may be cast, whether on heathen or on Christian ground, disfavor and opposition attending his success; and while the ministry of other denominations has but the world and sin to oppose it, he must expect to find Christian bulwarks and sanitary cordons drawn around his own. Who, then, in the name of humanity, shall be his friends and supporters, if his church is not! He has turned from the pleasures of the world, from the gains of business, from the honors of station; and, more than this, he has forgone much in social position and intercourse that he might have had, even in the ministry, but for his preference of truth to all else which the world or the church can bestow, and has given himself to be the servant of his people. Who, then, shall honor him if they do not? Who shall be just to his motives; who appreciate his labors; who cherish his reputation; who be lenient to his imperfections; who considerate of his peculiarities; who attentive to his wants; who sympathize in his sorrows; who help him bear his burdens; who cheer him in his toils and discouragements, if his own people will not do it? If they, at whose call he has trustingly given up to their welfare everything he had to give—his time, his strength, his intellect, and his heart—if they fail him, on whom shall he rely?

OBEAHISM.

The following extract from one of Mr. Richardson's letters, shows the lingering of this African superstition among the people of Jamaica:—

"More of the superstitious and wicked practices of Obeahism, &c., have fallen under my notice during the past year than ever before. Some two months since, a man of considerable intelligence, connected with my congregation, came to me one morning in great perplexity, to 'show minister his trouble.' Upon inquiry, I found that some evil-designing persons had been trying to 'obeah him.' They had been during the night, and buried a bottle and sundry things at the gate leading into his yard. Having often had the folly of such things pointed out to him, he resolved to break away from the trammels of superstition, and went boldly (?) and dug it up and threw it into the bush. But when he arose the next morning, and found that another had been put in its place during the night, his sense and courage both failed him, and his superstitious fears returned upon him with redoubled power. In his extremity he came to beg minister to go and break the fatal spell! When I found that I could neither reason nor laugh him out of his fright, I agreed to go. So, after waiting an hour or two, to perform a marriage ceremony in the chapel, I mounted my horse, and after a ride of two or three miles, I reached the place. But instead of some frightful-looking object, I merely found a junk-bottle filled with ashes and water, with an egg placed over the orifice instead of a cork, and bound on with a strip of white cloth, wound with an abundance of black linen thread—the whole surmounted by a small piece of silver coin! The bottle was buried to the neck, in the middle of the path, and no one dared to step over it, to pass out or come in! They had cut up a quantity of limes and squeezed out the juice upon it, and scattered them around, for the purpose, I suppose, of driving away the evil spirit; (many of them have great faith in the purifying virtues of lime-juice, often pouring it upon the coffin after it is placed in the grave.) Several of the neighbors had assembled, curious to know what I would do. I quietly removed the bottle from its place of deposit, gave the piece of money to a little girl who stood by, nothing loth to receive it, and then proceeded to examine the different articles one by one, remarking upon the folly and absurdity of supposing that any harm could come from such things. I appealed to the man to know if he were frightened by them. 'Yes, Minister, truth; me 'fraid! me 'fraid!' He said not one of the neighbors would touch or go near it. One man, however, offered to dig it up for eight dollars! He was, probably, the very one who put it there, and had taken that way to extort money from his superstitious neighbor! They frequently work upon the imagination in this way, until persons are really made sick and likely to die, and then persuade them to give them money to save their lives! Had I time, I could mention several cases of this kind within my own knowledge. But I forbear. Ignorance and superstition go hand in hand the world over.

THE MINISTER'S MIGHT IN GOD.

Philip Henry thus wrote upon a studying day: "I forgot when I began, explicitly and expressly, to crave help from God, and the chariot wheels drove accordingly. Lord, forgive my omission, and keep me in the way of duty."

Another old divine observes: "If God drop not down his assistance, we write with a pen that hath no ink. If any in the world need walk dependently upon God more than others, the minister is he."

It was once said to a minister of Christ, whose labors had been abundantly successful, "Sir, if you did not plough in your closet, you would not reap in your pulpit."

The eminent author of "The Saints' Rest," being reminded of his labors on his death-bed, replied, "I was but a pen in God's hand, and what praise is due to a pen?"

"After having composed and delivered a sermon," says Bishop Horne, "I have often thought of, and repeated the following lines of Thompson:—

> 'Be gracious, Heaven! for now laborious man
> Has done his part. Ye fostering breezes, blow!
> Ye softening dews, ye tender showers, descend!
> And temper all, thou world-reviving sun,
> Into a perfect year.'"

A minister has no ground to hope for fruits from his exertions until in himself he has no hope; until he has learned to put no faith in the point and energy of sentences; until he feels that a man may be mighty to compel the attention, and mighty to regale the imagination, and mighty to silence the gainsayer, and yet not mighty to the pulling down of strong-holds."

FUNERAL HYMN.

BY G. P. MORRIS.

I.

"Man dieth and wasteth away,
And where is he?"—Hark! from the skies
I hear a voice answer and say,
"The spirit of man never dies;
His body, which came from the earth,
Must mingle again with the sod;
But his soul, which in heaven had birth,
Returns to the bosom of God."

II.

No terror has death, or the grave,
To those who believe in the Lord—
We know the Redeemer can save,
And lean on the faith of his word;
While ashes to ashes, and dust
We give unto dust, in our gloom,
The light of salvation, we trust,
Is hung like a lamp in the tomb.

III.

The sky will be burnt as a scroll—
The earth, wrapped in flames, will expire;
But, freed from all shackles, the soul
Will rise in the midst of the fire.
Then, brothers, mourn not for the dead,
Who rest from their labors, forgiven;
Learn this from your Bible instead,
The grave is the gateway to heaven.

IV.

O Lord God Almighty! to Thee
We turn as our solace above;
The waters may fail from the sea,
But not from Thy fountains of love:
Oh, teach us Thy will to obey,
And sing with one heart and accord,
"He gave and He taketh away,
And praised be the name of the Lord!"

THE LATE DR. SHARP.

In one of our Baptist exchanges, we find the following notice of some of the leading characteristics of the late Rev. Dr. Sharp:—

Dr. Sharp was a man of peace. He shunned controversy, and loathed all contention. "I have no taste," he once said to me, "for the bitter waters of strife. I intend soon to preach a sermon from the words, 'I am for peace.'" Hence, while he was inflexibly firm in all matters of principle, never yielding a hair's breadth, he was one of the most pliable and conciliatory of men in all matters of opinion. He made a distinction between questions of right and questions of expediency, and allowed that question to regulate his conduct. From duty he could be neither seduced nor driven; but where the conscience was not immediately concerned, no man was ever more flexible. Like "Daniel, greatly beloved," among the captives of Babylon, "an excellent spirit was in him." He was truly a peacemaker, and on this account, as well as for his soundness of judgment, he was resorted to as a counsellor and a referee in ecclesiastical difficulties, more than any other minister in New England.

Dr. Sharp was habitually and conscientiously a man of truth. Every thing like prevarication and duplicity, and secret management, he abhorred. When he spoke, or wrote, you knew that you had the idea precisely as it existed in his mind. Who ever knew him to equivocate or dissemble? Did he ever exaggerate, or diminish, or color a fact? Were his utterances or his actions ever so equivocal as to require explanation? His mind, like the limpid fountain, was transparent, and he was never suspected of mental reservations, or of feelings of which his words and his conduct were not the faithful exponents.

Dr. Sharp was eminently just. As he understood his own rights, and wished them to be respected, so he acknowledged and honored the rights of others as equal to his own. He regarded justice as a primary virtue, and the slightest deviation from it was sure to forfeit his confidence. Pecuniary obligations he met with rigid fidelity; promises he fulfilled with invariable exactness. In his judgment of others, he aimed to be scrupulously just. If ever severe in any uttered opinion, it was an exception to his general habit, and easily tolerated because so unusual. His detestation of wrong was so deep as to make him earnest in its reprehension.

Dr. Sharp was conservative. He loved the past, and if a thing was good, he loved it the more because it had been tested by years, and proved serviceable to his predecessors. He rejoiced in all true progress, but he made a distinction between the real and the seeming. He could not join in every measure of reform simply because its end was good. He looked cautiously at the means proposed, and judged for himself of their probable tendency. What he could approve, he countenanced; to what he could not approve, he refused even the influence of his name. When it was intimated to him that he might fall behind his age, he replied, "I have lived too long to regard every forward movement as progress. I have found that when the world seems to be running away from me, I have only to stand still, and once in seven years it comes round where I am." He did not stand still. He went forward with Providence, and as he moved in a straight line, all his advancement was real. His cast of mind led him, not so much to originate projects of reform, as to detect the errors in those originated by others. He encouraged all that he considered as good, and hung with his whole weight upon the wheels of evil.

Dr. Sharp was a man of great purity. One of the most searching, discriminating sermons that I have ever heard, was preached by him from the words, "Cleanse thou me from secret faults." I remember another of great power, from the words, "I hate vain thoughts;" and still another from "I hate every false way." He understood well the relation between unholy thoughts and immoral conduct, and with a master's hand he sketched the evil tendency of every impure affection. He had purified his own soul in obeying the truth, and its issues were uncommonly free from the mixtures of inbred depravity. His thoughts were chaste, and therefore his speech and his manners were chaste. Lives there a man or woman who ever heard from his lips a sentence, a suggestion, an inuendo, an implication, an allusion that could raise a blush on the cheek of the purest? Who ever dared in his presence to utter a sentence bordering on indelicacy?

Dr. Sharp was ever kind and generous towards those who differed from him in theological creed and ecclesiastical relations. Though an European by birth, and nurtured amid institutions where religious freedom is recognized as a privilege conceded, more than as an inalienable right, yet he had the American idea of liberty of conscience, and developed that idea in both his teaching and his practice. He gave a broad construction to "the perfect law of liberty," measuring the freedom of others by the rule with which he measured his own. In him was nothing bigoted, nothing narrow. He had his preferences, grounded, not on accident of birth, not on the prejudices of education, not on the influence of early associations, for all those were adverse to the position which he occupied, but wholly upon his own interpretation of the inspired oracles; and yet, decided as were his convictions, he did not wreath them, or allow others to wreath them around his soul as chains of servility. He was free, and never in bondage to any man or party. Though he was of a sect, he never belonged to it in any but a Christian sense. His own views of doctrinal truth and church order were fixed; and, as he held them honestly, he supposed that others, though he believed them in error, might be equally honest; and if he could not fully approve, he could not find it in his heart to be intolerant. He loved true goodness wherever he discovered it, and gave it the friendly hand, without imagining that by acts of social urbanity, or by coöperation in works of philanthropy, he might jeopard any important principle, or countenance what he ought to condemn. Of all those who dwell with special emphasis upon his enlarged liberality, not one, probably, ever supposed him to be untrue to his avowed convictions as a Trinitarian and a Baptist. He was both, and in no position did he ignore his principles, or hold them unnecessarily in abeyance. To the late Dr. Channing, whose friendship he enjoyed, he made a full and undisguised statement of his belief; and to others he has done the same—so anxious was he to foreclose all misapprehension, and to let it be understood that he could do nothing to compromise his fealty to the truth of God. The fact was simply this: he held the truth in charity; and if the circle of his charity may have appeared to some as too comprehensive, it is possible that he may have regarded that of others as too restricted and exclusive. In such matters, he acted, not as the representative of a sect, but as an individual; and, as he never asked or wished others to regulate their liberty by his conscience, so he could demand, with the Apostle Paul, why his liberty should be judged by another man's conscience. That he loved and preferred his own denomination, he proved by abundant labors for the advancement of her particular interests. Can you mention the man whose name is more closely interwoven in her history—whose efforts were more freely or largely given to her enterprises—whose influence contributed more to her prosperity?

Such was the Rev. Dr. Sharp. He has finished his course; he has kept the faith; he has left no stain upon his profession; he has gone to receive an unfading crown. Other good men are left; but the number is small who will ever remind us of him, or who can supply the vacancy occasioned by his departure. In reviewing my own intercourse with him in an endeared intimacy of more than twenty years, I have no painful recollections. And now that he has retired from this scene of our earthly fellowship, I have felt like exclaiming as did Elisha to the ascending prophet, "My father! My father!" Who that survives may hope to receive his falling mantle? It would be indeed a legacy.

THE BEAM IN THE EYE.

"Mother, I don't like Mrs. Gay; I wish you would not visit her," said Fanny Miller to her mother, as that lady left the house.

"Why do you speak so, Fanny?" asked her mother, somewhat surprised.

"Because she is always talking about people. I don't believe she said three good or kind words about a single person this afternoon, and I could not help thinking she would talk about you after she went away. She is a tattler, mother, and I don't like her."

"You are very observing, Fanny, and quite positive in your assertions. It is too true that Mrs. Gay has the unfortunate habit of telling all the faults of her neighbors—"

"And suspecting a great many more, mother," interrupted Fanny, much excited. "Why, she said Elizabeth Lewis looked very fine in her new hat, to be sure, but she really believed her mother never meant to pay for it. Now, she knew nothing at all about it, and if she did, it was no matter to her. Elizabeth's hat is paid for; her aunt Harriet gave it to her for being so kind to little Ellen, and calling for her every morning to lead her to school."

Elizabeth was a particular friend of Fanny's, and therefore the insinuations of Mrs. Gay were not very pleasing to her.

Mrs. Miller smiled, as she answered: "I fear our visitor has ruffled your temper a little by making too free with your friends. You are not quite so vexed because she said that the Browns did not pay their rent, and had let their store bill run two or three years. If I remember, the Browns are no great favorites of yours."

"But, mother," replied Fanny, blushing deeply, "do you not think Mrs. Gay does wrong in talking so much about people? She don't know that she is telling the truth, and even if she is, what good is there in telling it?"

"I certainly think, my child, with the philosopher of old, that among wild beasts the most dangerous is a slanderer. I do not approve of Mrs. Gay's course at all, my dear. Could you not see that by my conversation?"

"Yes, mother," answered Fanny; and then, after hesitating a little, added: "But why do you associate with her, then?"

"My child," returned her mother, "Mrs. Gay is a widow, and she has but few friends, for her unhappy failing renders her society unwelcome to most people. She was a schoolmate of mine when we were both young, and her propensity for talking was as proverbial then as now. She always had some complaint to make to the teacher against some one, and if a fault were committed, Sarah Wiley was sure to fix upon the offender, who, however, was quite as often proved innocent as guilty.

"I do not think she really meant to tell falsehoods, but she certainly would raise very large buildings upon the most slender foundations, and when they fell she was ever ready to commence another. She was a constant annoyance to the teacher, by calling out in the class, 'Mary has a book open,' 'Anna is telling,' 'Jane is not paying attention;' and many a punishment has she received for this very thing.

"I remember how she once most foolishly involved herself in a serious difficulty, by the habit of zeal without knowledge. The teacher had a beautiful penknife, which she valued very highly, and which, after being laid upon her desk, could not be found.

"Inquiry was made of the girls concerning it, but no information could be obtained, till Sarah happily hit upon the right track, as she thought; she remembered seeing Charlotte Lewis, who was then absent, have it in the afternoon. The next day, on being asked, Charlotte instantly replied: 'That she had used the knife by permission, and had left it where she found it.'

"This was believed by all except Sarah, who gave several knowing winks and tosses of the head, mysteriously hinting that she was sure where the knife was; it would be found with the scissors and thimble she had lent Charlotte Lewis, and had never seen since.

"In a few days suspicion was quite excited against poor Charlotte, and even the teacher began to entertain some doubts about her integrity.

"Just at this time I commenced attending school again, having been detained at home a week on account of sickness.

"Sarah ran to me with the wonderful news and she had not half finished before I sprang to a little drawer in the desk, and found the knife where I had placed it, for safe keeping, on the last afternoon I attended school. That night Sarah found her thimble and scissors in a basket where she had placed them herself, and had forgotten them.

"And only last week, Mrs. Gay, true to the bent of her youth, reported that Mr. Arnott and his wife had parted on account of a quarrel about property. The truth was, Mr. Arnott, who knows her character, and who is something of a wag, told her, in answer to some question about his wife, 'that they had some words and parted; Mrs. Arnott wanted a large sum of money, which he could not give to her, and she had left him to go home to her father's.'

"By the time the news of their separation was pretty widely spread, the absconding lady returned from a visit to her father, with several hundred dollars left her by an aunt."

"But, mother," said Fanny, "I should think she would see the folly of this course, and refrain from it."

"Do you see that tree in the corner of the yard, Fanny? When a tiny thing, it was bent down to the earth and embedded there. It then shot up again, but it is remedilessly deformed. The sun may shine, the dew and the rain may fall, but the tree will never be straight. I do not mean to say that Mrs. Gay will never reform, but she will find it difficult to do so; for bad habits once fixed, are hard things to root out."

"Well, mother, I hope I shall never be guilty of this sin, for I would not be such a mean, despicable thing as Mrs. Gay is, for all the world."

"I believe Mrs. Gay applied the terms 'mean and despicable,' to Mrs. Norris," observed Mrs. Miller, quietly.

Fanny blushed deeply, and exclaimed: "O mother! I didn't think what I was saying."

"Will you receive that from Mrs. Gay as an apology for her fault, Fanny? Take heed that you 'cast the beam out of your own eye,' before you attempt to 'pull out the mote' from your neighbor's."

A HINT TO MINISTERS.

A certain minister, who had been very successful in the gospel vineyard, at length saw but very little fruit attending his ministrations. To be useless, he could not bear—his soul was bowed down under the discouraging prospects around him. Nothing on earth was so gloomy to him as a spiritual dearth; for he had been used to showers of reformation and mercy, and nothing else could satisfy his mind. Seeing no outpouring of the Spirit, no sinners converted under his preaching for some time, his soul was beset with desponding and melancholy fears.

While thus exercised, he dreamed a gentleman hired him to work for him, and the price of his labor, per day, was stipulated. On inquiring what his employer would have him go about, he was informed he must go and hammer a certain rock to pieces. "That," he replied, "will do no good, for the rock is large and hard—I could never break it to pieces." "That is nothing to you," said the gentleman, "follow my directions, and I will pay you your wages."

The laborer then went to work; and though it appeared an endless, and therefore useless task, he labored with diligence and patience for the sake of his wages. After a while, contrary to all his calculations, the mountainous rock broke into shivers.

The minister saw that the dream contained instruction for him; he felt the reproof, resumed his charge, and was again blessed with seeing the rocky hearts of his hearers broken by the hammer of God's word. [South Pres.

The Best Security.—At the late meeting of the American Board in Cleveland, Rev. Mr. Treat mentioned the following incident: "Mr. Hamlin, of the American Mission, on one occasion, wished to obtain a loan to apply towards the erection of a stone building, for the purposes of the mission. The rate of interest demanded was twelve per cent. if the security was the building, but if it was the obligation of the American Board, only six per cent. "Why this difference?" asked Mr. Hamlin. "Because," it was replied, "Earthquakes may injure your stone building, or political changes may occur to affect its value, but neither of these can reach the American Board of Foreign Missions.'"

Business Notice.—The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society has been in operation nearly five years—long enough, certainly, to carry on the publishing business without a thorough settlement of accounts. Such a settlement we intend to have before the close of the present volume of the Sabbath Recorder. An Agent has been engaged for the purpose, who will enter upon his work about the first of February. Those indebted to the establishment need be in no doubt as to the amount of their indebtedness, inasmuch as bills have been sent them each year. What we wish now to say to them is, that in all cases where the amount of those bills is forwarded to us immediately, by mail direct, or through our local agents, the accounts will be squared on our books. In all cases where payment is delayed until the Agent calls, [illegible] cents per year will be added, according to our publishing terms. Promptness will save the trouble and expense of a call from the agent.

We trust it will not be inferred from what we have said, that we do not consider it the duty of ministers to publish the gospel after the manner of private Christians. Let no one understand us as claiming exemption for them from the kind of labor we would impose upon the brethren at large. We claim no such thing. Unquestionably, it is the duty of a minister to put forth efforts for the conversion of souls, over and above his public addresses to them from the pulpit. He, like his people, should be ready to speak of Christ in a free, conversational way, on all suitable occasions. But we are not sure that it is his duty professionally, any more than it is that of every other Christian. It is his duty simply because he is a Christian, not because he is a minister. He has been ordained, and constituted an overseer of the flock, it is true. But this was not done, that he might have authority to preach the gospel—that is, to proclaim, or publish, (for such is the meaning of the word preach,) Christ risen from the dead, able and mighty to save. This is every Christian's privilege; the Lord made it so in his last Commission. But it was done to constitute him an instructor of the church. To convert sinners to Christ, is the business of the people—the members of the church in general, and of each one in particular. It is the minister's duty to instruct them afterwards—to establish them in the faith—to carry them on from first principles to perfection in knowledge. This is his appropriate work, and he is under no greater obligation to add to it the work of laboring for the conversion of sinners, than every Christian is under obligation to add it to his daily employment. Feed my sheep—feed the flock (the church) of God—expresses the appropriate function of the ordained pastor; and it is worthy of note, that the design of the different offices instituted by the Head of the church is the perfecting of the saints, the edification of the body of Christ, the unity of all in the faith and knowledge of the Son of God, till they shall finally arrive at the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, and be no longer children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine. Eph. 4: 11, &c.

To guard against misapprehension, we remark, that we do not mean to imply, that the instruction of Christians should be the sole work of the minister in the pulpit. The warning of sinners to flee from the wrath to come may, undoubtedly, constitute a part of his public exercises. The assemblies that hear him being of a promiscuous character, it would be a gross dereliction of duty, should he never address the unconverted. Even the bishop must "do the work of an evangelist." 2 Tim. 4: 5.

But that Christians of all classes are to make it their business to proclaim Christ to the impenitent, is manifest, not only from the broad, comprehensive terms of the Great Commission, but from other parts of Scripture. Paul directs the Phillipian believers to let their light shine in the world by "holding forth the word of life." Phil. 2: 16. They were all to hold it forth; not merely their minister, but the whole number of those whose duty it was to be "blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation." And Paul thanked God, not that the morality, but that the faith, of his brethren was celebrated throughout the world. (See Rom. 1: 8; 1 Thes. 1: 8.) They were known every where as a people who had embraced the doctrine of Christ crucified. They were not ashamed to avow their faith—to proclaim it—to preach it.

That private Christians should go about holding meetings, by appointment, here and there, it is not the design of these remarks to inculcate. Yet that those who are gifted in exhortation should do so, as far as may be consistent with other duties, is perfectly proper. We were once connected with a church, three or four of whose members were in the habit of going out into neighboring localities, and gathering the people together, to talk to and pray with them, and their labors were much blessed. They made no pretensions to ministerial gifts, but they were known as godly men, and the people always welcomed their coming.

If the gift of exhortation were more anxiously cultivated, with this object in view, much good would result. But it is probable, that most Christians would labor under too much embarrassment in attempting this method of proclaiming the Saviour. But who cannot familiarly talk to his neighbor, and manifest an earnestness for his salvation? All are not alike gifted in conversation, it is true; but in whatever degree it is possessed, it can be employed in telling the "good news," as well as in any other way. But let excuses on this score be what they may, there is one delinquency of Christians which admits of no excuse. They do not interest themselves in persuading others to visit the house of God. If they have no gift in talking to the impenitent themselves, they can at least do something to get them where the minister can address them. How many poor, perishing sinners, might be brought within range of Gospel truth, in our cities, if church members would kindly invite them, and take some pains to remove every embarrassment out of the way! How easy it would be to say, 'Come, go with me next Sabbath to hear the gospel preached; you shall be welcome to a seat in my pew; and, that you may feel no embarrassment, I will call for you at your house!' And if, in addition, a fervent prayer were raised to God, that the minister might be enabled so to speak as that the one persuaded to attend might be saved, who knows but what he might become a permanent hearer without any farther labor? Or if the effort had to be repeated, again and again, why should the Christian feel it an irksome business? And if the church member were to take a little farther trouble, it would be nothing more than his duty. If, for instance, he would be at some pains to establish freedom of intercourse between his pastor and perishing sinners around; if he would go with him to introduce him, to second his efforts, and to remove, as far as practicable, all impediments, how much might be done to render the gospel a blessing to the people!

But, for the most part, church members give themselves no concern about such things. If they go to meeting themselves, they fancy they have done their duty. If others do not attend, it is the minister's fault; they have hired him to attend to such cases, and they expect to do it the best way he can. If impediments stand in the way, he must overcome them himself, and not look for aid from them. He must find ways and means of access to the people by his own skill. Thus, church members neither preach the gospel themselves, nor provide the requisite facilities for their minister to do it effectively. T. B. B.

SKETCHES FROM NOTES OF A TOUR THROUGH VIRGINIA AND OHIO.

The place where I had stopped is within the bounds of Stokes Church. The next day, Sabbath, Sept. 17th, went to their place of meeting, where I met Eld Joshua Hill. He had recently returned from Farmington, Ill., where he had been for a number of years, and was laboring in the employ of the Executive Board of the Ohio Association. At his request I preached; after which we repaired to a small stream, some three miles distant, where he immersed two candidates, who had previously offered themselves to the church. The next day I preached again at the same place. I found, by conversing with the families where I visited, that the Holy Spirit had been operating upon a number of young people, besides those who had lately professed Christ.

First-day, the 18th, Dea. Wm. Furrow accompanied me to Jackson. The distance between the two churches is about eight miles. Here, too, I found that Eld. Hill's labors had begun to bring forth fruit. He had lately immersed two, on profession of faith, and others were awakened. Yet the greater part of the people were in a state of paralizing discouragement. I remained here until Oct. 10th, the day following the close of the Association, holding meetings nearly every evening, on Sabbath and First-days, and sometimes at 6 o'clock in the morning; during which time God graciously visited his drooping heritage, lifting up the bowed down, rekindling the light of hope in many hearts, and speaking words of forgiveness and peace to guilt-stricken, confessing sinners.

It is always interesting to see the progress of God's work in times of revival, but there were a number of incidents in this, that were especially so to me. One striking feature, was the poignant sense of guilt manifested by awakened sinners, and the fearful and protracted struggle through which they passed, before they obtained evidence of acceptance with God. Time after time we witnessed the same thrilling scene—the anxious coming forward for prayer, completely broken down, and overwhelmed, expressing a full determination to seek the Lord, yet hopeless. A number of young men remained about the place of worship several times until a late hour at night—at one time until past 12 o'clock—with their faces bowed to the earth, pleading for pardon. The voice of supplication, borne on the still air of midnight, from sinners agonized with conviction of sin, produced impressions upon the minds of those who heard it, which will not soon be forgotten. It was not until a special and earnest effort was made to encourage them in the exercise of confidence in the invitation and promises of the Gospel, that the first expressions of hope were uttered. After such a time of travail, it was pleasant to hear the seekers, one after another, announce that they had found peace in believing.

At the first invitation, nine offered themselves as candidates for membership by immersion. First-day, Oct. 2d, was designated as the time to attend the ordinance; but before the time arrived the number was increased to sixteen. The Big Miami, at Port Jefferson, a distance of nine miles, was the nearest convenient water. The distance, however, seemed to be no barrier to a general attendance. When we stood at the water's edge, but few whose countenances had become familiar in the congregation were missing. It was a pleasant place, and many appeared to partake of the inspiring influences of the occasion. Elders Simeon Babcock and Joshua Hill were present; but as a sort of common concession seemed to point to me as the administrator, I led the converts into the water. They arose from the symbolic burial with a spirit of joy and praise, which was met by one of a kindred sort from the shore.

The Association, which opened Oct. 6th, attracted numbers from a distance, who had not been present before. The meeting of friends and brethren, the presence of that cordiality which is the legitimate fruit of revival and the trophies of victory, all tended to make it a pleasant season. It closed on the 9th (First-day,) and with it my labors here. After the morning sermon, opportunity being given, three more presented themselves as candidates for immersion. Invitation was also given to any who had been members of this or other churches, to unite; in response to which six came forward and were received.

After the commencement of the revival, I was often curiously, though by no means unfavorably, impressed with a significant expression of spiritual fellowship, by way of shaking hands, which I first saw among the brethren in Virginia. At the water, the candidates, as they came dripping from the liquid grave, met extended hands, by which theirs were shaken and passed to others, and thus they were escorted, with these silent but expressive congratulations, through the yielding crowd to a comfortable position on the shore. I too, if detained a moment for the preparation of a candidate, received from all within reach the same hearty expression of "good cheer." At the time, also, when those lone pilgrims, some of whom had seen their spiritual dwelling places crumble into decay, some of them aged and feeble sought an asylum in the bosom of the church, this salutation, extended to them by many of the members, accom- to them by many of the members, accompanied by the falling tears of joy, was a touching exhibition of voiceless eloquence.

The Sabbath-keepers of Western Ohio were formerly from Virginia. It is above forty years since they made the first settlement in Clark County, near Springfield; but the first church (Northampton) was organized in 1837. They are now nearly all gone from this place, and the church has become extinct. The settlement in Jackson, Shelby Co., and that in Stokes, Logan Co., are principally made up of those who formerly lived here. There was, also, a church at Port Jefferson, nine miles from Jackson, and in the same County, which is not now in existence. Another on the Sciota River, in Picaway Co., about twenty miles south of Columbus, has shared the same fate. The people of the latter were principally from the State of New York. Thus, of five churches, only two are left to hold up the light of the Sabbath. The settlements where they are, are comparatively new. When operations were commenced here, from twelve to fifteen years since, the country was a wildeness. But when the hand of industry and enterprise has brought it to its highest capacity for improvement, it will be very beautiful, as well as very productive.

On all the great questions which lay claim to public attention, the people, generally, take the side of reform. They are becoming much interested upon the subject of education. A Select School has been sustained at Jackson, most of the time for three years. They are anxious to obtain some young man to come among them and identify himself with their educational interests, and make an effort to permanently establish a school. There is no reason to doubt that, with such energy and talent as have been exerted in building up schools in other parts of our denomination, such an enterprise might succeed, and the people here become enabled to exert a commanding influence in dispensing educational facilities to those about them.

In the estimation of those who look forward with the expectation that our borders are to extend westward at the rate they have heretofore, in proportion to our whole increase, this must be an important point, destined at no distant day to be, geographically, our denominational center.

Oct. 10th, Bro. Calvin Davis carried me to Bellefontaine, a distance of seventeen miles, where I took the cars about 12 M., and going by the way of Cleveland, Erie, and Dunkirk, arrived at home the next day. T. E. B.

FIXTURES FOR FAMILY PRAYER.

The following extract from the Protestant Churchman, an organ of the low-church Episcopalians, shows how nicely things can be fixed for family prayer by those who have the necessary taste and money:—

"It is generally the custom for the family to meet in the breakfast room or parlor, for prayers; but all must see and feel the impropriety of such a practice.

"A room should be set apart, the furniture of which should, as much as possible, disassociate it from the apartments used for the other purposes of the family. It should stand east and west, and had better have no room over it, but there being no altar, this is not essentially necessary. It should be long in proportion to its width, and the door being in the west end, a small portion might be screened off for an ante-chapel. Along the side walls, and returned against the screen, a bench, which may be divided into seats by arms, should be placed, and in front a low, narrow desk. This desk had better not be more than thirty-two inches high, and may be formed merely by two upright ends, with an inclined board, say five inches broad, between them, supported by another narrow board placed edgewise. The standards might be ornamented by poppy heads. The windows may be filled with stained glass, especially the east windows, which, of course, if possible, should be more dignified than the others. If there is no east window, a cross should be placed against the wall, or a picture; and the walls all around might be adorned with pictures or prints, care being taken that they be of a devotional character. The seats should stop a few feet short of the east end of the room; and so the whole will recall the general features of the church. If more seats are needed, a second row may be placed in front of the first, also provided with desks; these might be smaller, and appropriated to the children's use. A hanging of rich stuff stretched upon the walls will be a great improvement. Sconces for candles will be found most convenient for lighting."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Sunday Steamer on the Clyde.

GLASGOW, December 16th, 1853.

Yesterday the decision was given in the Court of Session on the Clyde Sunday Steamer case—a decision which, while professing not to legislate in regard to Sunday desecration, will tend to secularize still farther the day of the church's preference. The pleadings took place about ten days ago, but the decision was delayed. In the opening statement of the Lord Chief Justice, yesterday, the delay seems accounted for. The case is one of "public expectation," and their Lordships have been more than ordinarily careful that the grounds of their judgment "should be accurately understood." We have already reported, that it arose out of the opposition of Sir James Colquhoun to the passengers of the Emperor steamer landing on any of the piers in the Gareloch on Sundays. Failing to prevent this by physical force, he applied to the Court of Session, our highest Scottish judicatory, for an interdict. It is the decision upon that application, that we now report.

The Chief Justice said Sir James claimed authority to prevent these passengers from landing there, on the ground of the piers being erected on his property, strengthened by the consideration that to come there on Sunday was contrary to law. His Lordship said that it was evident from the Note of Suspension, that the case rested on the question as to whether Sir James, as proprietor, could close the pier at will against the public. "So far as is known to us, there is nothing to prevent this vessel leaving the port of Glasgow on Sunday, and sailing down the Clyde to the Gareloch, more than against any vessel leaving any port on Sunday, or sailing on any part of the British coast. And Sir J. Colquhoun could not in this court present any suspension on this ground, and does not." It was not therefore as a question of Sunday desecration that they were to determine, but the rights of a proprietor of lands along the shore of a navigable loch. The forcible manner in which these supposed rights had been attempted to be maintained was seriously condemned, as tending to lead to violence and outrage. The piers, though erected by Sir James, were places of public resort, at which dues were levied and enforced. The court does not know on what authority these dues have been levied, and are not to be understood as sanctioning the legality of this, although the passengers of the Sunday steamer make no complaint on this ground. Nor does the court know under what sanction of Government these piers have been erected, and they intimate no opinion of the right of a private party to do so; but "they are of opinion, that a party who builds piers in such situations on the sea coast, avowedly for the accommodation of all who frequent them," receiving dues, makes such piers public piers, and "he has no more right to exclude any of the public than a burgh in possession of a grant of free port." He is not in a better situation than the owner of a regular port, and must submit to the consequences of such piers being open and patent to the public.

As to the piers being made places of resort on Sunday, so that the day will thereby be desecrated, the Court say that although to prevent this may be very laudable, it is a question whether a public landing place can be so closed, on which they give no final opinion. Sir James may try the question separately; but on his own showing in the present case, he has no right to make by-laws for a public pier to exclude the public on Sundays. We must look at the case of those who for necessary purposes would have occasion to come on that day. "There is no public law which shuts up piers, harbors, and highways, on Sundays."

There can be little doubt, that the effect of this decision will be an increased number of steamers on the Clyde in the ensuing summer. It is another step towards reducing Sunday to its place among "the six working days."

THE CANADA CLERGY RESERVES.

We have read a good deal, first and last, about the Clergy Reserves in Canada, but have nowhere seen the facts relating thereto so distinctly stated as in the following extract from one of our exchanges. No wonder that the proscribed denominations complain of the injustice done them under existing laws.

It appears that various acts have been proposed by the Imperial Parliament, intended for the encouragement of the Protestant religion, and the support of its ministers. Among others, one was passed in 1791, for the Government of Canada, which provided that a seventh portion of all lands granted to the Province, should be set apart 'for the support and maintenance of a Protestant Clergy.' Under this law, the amount of lands set aside, under the name of Clergy Reserves, was 3,346,252 acres.

In 1850, the revenue from these Reserves, amounted to £53,737 13s. 9d., and it has been computed that when the lands are all sold, and the proceeds added to the accumulated fund, the annual interest will be over £100,000.

Until 1840, the territorial revenue of Canada was at the disposal of the Imperial Government, and the sums paid on account of religion had been taken out of the various funds under its control, but since that year these disbursements have been made solely out of the Clergy Reserves. The sums paid since then, and the list of churches receiving them, are subjoined—the amounts being stated in round numbers:

Church of England	£175,000
Church of Rome	20,000
Ch. of Scotland and other Scotch Presb.	80,000
Wesleyan Methodists	15,000
Total	£290,000

Up to the year 1850, the whole amount paid by the country to the few favored sects had exceeded two millions one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, and since then it is stated that a sum sufficient to make up a grand total of two millions five hundred thousand dollars has been added. Of this sum the Roman Catholics have received something like £50,000, and the Wesleyan Methodists £25,000. The balance has been absorbed by the Episcopalians and Scotch Churches; while the Independents, the Baptists, various bodies of Presbyterians, several offshoots of the Methodist Church, and many other Protestant Churches, have received nothing.

SABBATH-BREAKING AND FIRES.

The New York Evangelist notices the destruction by fire of the clipper-ship Great Republic, and intimates that it may be considered a judgment for Sabbath-breaking. The facts in the case are, that much curiosity existed to see the arrangements of this mammoth ship—to gratify which, her owners consented to admit visitors on the payment of a small fee, the avails to be given to a charitable institution. As Sunday was a leisure day with working people, they naturally visited it in large numbers on that day—some of them thinking, no doubt, that their contribution for a charitable object would cover any sin of Sabbath-breaking which the visit might involve. But the ship was burnt—the insurance companies suffered to the amount of nearly her entire value—and all because her owners, (not the insurance companies, upon whom the loss fell,) saw fit to gratify public curiosity, and aid a public charity, by admitting visitors on Sunday!

This may all be as the Evangelist supposes; though we must frankly confess, that the case seems to us not very clearly made out. But there was a fire in New York, not long ago, the connection of which with Sabbath-breaking, may well be considered—we mean the fire which destroyed the publishing establishment of the Messrs. Harpers. That company, it is well known, have all along been very strict observers of the Sunday; and when, on one occasion, a Sabbatarian spoke to a member of the firm about the claims of the seventh day—the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment—he referred to the fact that they had never allowed any work done on Sunday, and intimated that the spirit of the Fourth Commandment was thus pretty fully obeyed by them. But on Sabbath day (Saturday) Dec. 10th, at noon, when that great establishment was in full blast, the cry of fire was heard, and before sunset nearly the whole concern was a heap of ruins, involving the loss of a million of dollars, which fell mostly upon those by whose direction work was proceeding, in violation of the command, "The Seventh Day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shall not do any work." What a rebuke of Sabbath-breaking!

ENDOWMENT OF UNION COLLEGE.

For some time past it has been reported that Dr. Nott was about to endow Union College in a princely manner. Revival in the Friendship Church.—Under date of Nile, Allegany Co., N. Y., Dec. 30th, Bro. Ezekiel R. Clarke informs us of a pleasant revival in the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Friendship. For two or three months past, frequent meetings have been held there, under the direction of Eld. Hiram P. Burdick of Hartsville, which have resulted in the addition of twenty-six members to the church, of whom twenty-five were baptized, and three embraced the Bible Sabbath.

Uncle Tom's Cabin.—The publishers of this work, Messrs. Jewett & Co., Boston, have printed and sold three hundred thousand copies. If we add to this the sales in Europe, the whole will foot up probably one and a quarter million copies.

Moravian Missions in the West India Islands.—The following extract from a Report of the United Brethren's (or Moravian) Missionary Society, in Bridgetown, Barbados, 1853, shows the home action of the Society, in addition to extensive foreign operations.

In the British West Indies likewise our brethren, besides their great and peculiar vocation of preaching the Gospel of Christ to sinners generally, are paying particular attention to education.

In Tobago and St. Kitts, the Day and Sunday Schools are very large and effective.

In Antigua, besides the station schools, we find the training institution in blessed activity, to which has recently been added an establishment in the City of St. John's, for the training of female teachers.

In Jamaica, the wants of the scattered population are met by 28 additional schools, for the supply of which with teachers a training institution is in successful operation. In Barbados, likewise, while desirous zealously and earnestly to preach "repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ," we are fully aware of the vast importance of Scriptural education to the community at large, as well as to individual souls. Hence we have exerted ourselves more than ever in this direction, and have been favored with the generous assistance of the local government, and sympathy of several respectable philanthropic individuals. Nor have our efforts been unsuccessful. At all our stations a considerable increase has taken place in the number attending our schools, while such alterations have been made as are likely to render them more effective.

Death of Mrs. Opie.—Mrs. Amelia Opie died recently, in the 85th year of her age, at her residence in Norwich, Eng. Mrs. Opie was the widow of John Opie, a historical painter of eminent distinction in England. She was well known to the literary public as the writer of several popular works, most of them novels, which had a quite successful run in their day. Her first work, published in 1801, was a domestic tale entitled "The Father and Daughter." This was followed by her "Simple Tales," in four volumes, in 1806; "New Tales," four volumes, 1818; "Temper; or, Domestic Scenes," three volumes, and "Tales of the Heart," four volumes, at a subsequent period. In 1828 she published "Detraction Displayed," a work written with a moral purpose, intended, as she says, to expose "that most common of all vices, in every rank or class of society, from the peer to the peasant, from the master to the valet, from the mistress to the maid, from the most learned to the most ignorant, from the man of genius to the meanest capacity." Her "Illustrations of Lying," has been widely circulated in this country. She was the author of "Lays of the Dead," and other poems, which have been admired for their purity of style and pathos. During the last quarter of a century Mrs. Opie was a consistent member of the Society of Friends, and she lived in comparative seclusion, highly esteemed and beloved by all who were acquainted with her.

Temperance in Sweden.—The recent speech of the King of Sweden, on opening the Sessions of the Storthing or Estates at Stockholm, rises above the common-places generally uttered on the like occasions. The question of Temperance has received, so to say, a royal consecration. In speaking of the scanty harvest, the King denounces the waste of grain "to a great extent in the fabrication of a liquor, (Alcohol,) the abuse of which threatens to undermine the most noble faculties of our population." Further, he states that "from all parts of the kingdom petitions have been presented to me soliciting that a limit may be put to the present extravagant fabrications of strong drink, and to the immoderate abuse which is the consequence of the facility of obtaining it. A proposition embracing this important subject will be presented to the Diet, and I am convinced that it will, with eagerness, meet my paternal wishes."

Liberal Bequests.—Mrs. Hannah Bigelow, of East Hartford, (widow of the late Wm. Bigelow,) who died Dec. 16, made the following liberal bequests:—

Theological Institute, South Windsor, to found two scholarships, to be called "Bigelow Scholarships," $2,000; American Home Missionary Society, $2,000; American Education Society, $1,000; Retreat for the Insane, for the support of patients from East Hartford, when there are any who need it, $1,000; Connecticut Branch of the American Tract Society, the income to be applied to the support of colporteurs, $1,000; Connecticut Colonization Society, $1,000; Congregational Society of East Hartford, the income to be applied to increase the Sunday School Library, $500. And the residue of her estate, of whatever nature, after paying a few small legacies to relatives and friends, to the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

The Pope's Nuncio in Cincinnati.—The Pope's Nuncio, Mr. Bedini, officiated in Cincinnati on Sunday, Dec. 25th. In the evening, a company of Germans, who consider Bedini as having betrayed the cause of liberty in Rome in 1848, collected around the house of the Archbishop, where he was stopping. The police came upon them, and after a desperate struggle, some sixty were arrested. Fourteen persons were wounded in the melee, of whom one died the next morning. The Germans are charged with an intention to kill the Nuncio, but they say they intended simply to burn him in effigy.

Death of a Missionary's Wife.—The Rochester Democrat notices the death of Mrs. Nesbitt, wife of the Rev. Mr. Nesbitt, of the Burmah Mission. Mr. N. graduated at the Theological Seminary in Rochester in July, 1852. He is now on his return to this country, having suffered not only from ill health since his departure, but from a mental malady which, it is hoped, will be speedily overcome when he finds himself again in the midst of early friends.

A National Convention of the Disciple Churches will be held at Cleveland, Ohio, January 11 and 12, to consider and decide upon the most efficient plan to aid in removing the evils of American Slavery, and to free the Church from all responsibility for them while they exist.

Mr. Walsh, of New York, objected to the passage of the resolution, and it was laid over. Mr. Bennett, of New York, introduced a bill granting lands to the States to aid in the construction of railroads and for the support of Common Schools, after which the House adjourned till Third-day.

European News.

The steamship Africa, with European dates to Dec. 17th, arrived at New York Dec. 30th.

The advices per Africa are very favorable for Breadstuffs, which have advanced and were in active demand.

The private letters by the Africa indicate that a general war in Europe is looked upon as much more imminent than before, and that the commercial world has concluded that even if it comes, trade will be flourishing.

From England, we have the announcement that Lord Palmerston has resigned, owing to his opposition to the Reform Bill, which is to be presented at the next session of Parliament.

From the seat of war in the East, we have a great many rumors. The substance of the news will be found in the following paragraph:—

The news from the seat of war in Asia,—for from the Danube there is nothing,—is favorable to the Turks. While the intelligence of the defeat of Osman Pasha's flotilla at Sinope, as reported by the previous steamer, is confirmed in its essential points, it is shown to have been grossly exaggerated, and its true nature concealed by the Russian bulletins. The superiority of the Russians was very great, and the valor of the Turks desperate. Indeed, the affair now wears the appearance of a Russian rather than a Turkish defeat, for two of the Muscovite ships were destroyed in the contest. The carnage among the Turks was exceedingly great, five thousand of them having been killed in this single fight, as appears by the most authentic reports. Certainly, the fighting was desperate, and whatever the bravery of the Russians, considering their overwhelming superiority, they could not have fought with the same enthusiasm as their opponents. On land, it is reported that the Russians have gained signal advantages in the neighborhood of Akholzik; but it is not pretended that they have reconquered that important fortress, and we may, therefore, well regard their pretented victory as mainly apocryphal. On the other land, we see no reason to disbelieve the statement that the Circassians and Turks are acting together, and that they have captured Redut Kaleh, the principal Russian fortress on the Black Sea.

A Geneva paper mentions, that on the 4th Dec., between 10 and 11 o'clock at night, a shock of earthquake, sufficiently violent to crack the walls of several houses, occurred in the Val d'Illiez. The shock was repeated toward morning, the undulations of the earth being prolonged for some seconds, and were accompanied by a dull, heavy noise. A similar phenomenon was observed at Sion, in the Valais, on the 3d.

The Battle on the Black Sea.

In our notice, last week, of the naval engagement between the Russians and Turks, there was some indefiniteness and exaggeration. The following paragraph from the N. Y. Tribune gives the principal facts:—

The battle at Sinope was comparatively insignificant, though, as far as our imperfect intelligence can clear up the facts, it was gallantly contested on both sides. It was fought, not between the numerous and powerful Turkish fleet of the Black Sea, and a corresponding number of Russian ships, but between a Turkish squadron of three frigates and two little steamers, with some small transport, and a force of six sail of the line, twelve frigates, and some smaller vessels, commanded by Vice-Admiral Nachimoff, the oldest Russian Commander on that Sea. The Turkish Admiral Osman Pasha was proceeding up the coast, conveying men and stores to Batun for the Turkish army in Asia, when he was met by the enemy's fleet of Sinope, a place on the southern shore, just in that part where the Sea is narrowest, with the Russian naval station of Sevastapol nearly opposite on the northern shore, the distance between the two places being about 170 miles. It seems that the main action took place in the harbor, where Osman Pasha endeavored to find refuge from the superior force of Nachimoff. So desperate was the fighting, that the Russians, according to their own account, carried away only one prize, the flag-ship of the squadron, and she sunk before they reached Sevastopol. All the other vessels were destroyed, we are told, except one, which made good its escape. At the same time the Russian fleet was so damaged in the fight that some of its craft had serious difficulty in making port.

Great Fire in New York.

At 1 o'clock on Tuesday morning, Dec. 27th, a fire broke out in the building No. 244 Front-st., New York. The wind was high, and the flames spread rapidly, consuming or greatly injuring six buildings on Front-street and four on Water-st.

While the fire was raging in this locality, the sparks were so thick in the vicinity as to assume the appearance of raining fire. The streets and docks along the East River were literally alive with burning coals. The pier at the foot of Dover-st. was at one time covered to the depth of some inches with cinders, and the rigging and masts of the numerous vessels lying in the stream were completely enveloped in flying sparks. The seamen and others strenuously exerted themselves to prevent the canvas from igniting, but in most instances the high wind rendered their efforts useless.

About 1½ o'clock the rigging of the stupendous new ship Great Republic took fire. Owing to the immense hight of her masts, it was impossible for the engines to play upon the flames, and the consequence was, that the falling spars soon set her deck in a blaze. At 3 o'clock her foremast fell, knocking her mainyard out of the slings, and shortly after the mainmast came down across the deck. Her mizzenmast followed, carrying with it her spankermast. The vessel was now a perfect wreck, being one mass of flame abaft the mainmast. It is said that it was impossible to tow her into the stream, owing to the lowness of the tide, and for the same reason it is said that although she was scuttled, the destruction of the greater part of the hull could not be prevented, even with her keel touching the bottom.

From the Great Republic the fire communicated to the ship Joseph Walker, lying in the same slip, and in a short time her upper works were enveloped in flames.

The clipper-ship White Squall, lying next to the Great Republic, caught fire in the rigging, and was soon in a blaze from stem to stern. She was towed into the stream by one of the Fulton Ferry boats, and drifted up the river opposite the Navy Yard, where she burned to the water's edge.

In addition to the above, several other vessels—mostly schooners and sloops—had their spars and rigging burned. The majority of them, however, escaped total destruction by slipping their cables and drawing out into the stream.

The Great Republic was the largest merchantman in the world. She was 325 feet long, 53 wide, and 37 feet deep, and measured 4,550 tuns. She was built in Boston, by Captain McKay, at a cost of $300,000, and was launched in October last. She had come to New York to take cargo for Liverpool, and was fully loaded when the disaster took place. The vessel was insured for $175,000, and the freight for $100,000.

The ship Joseph Walker, Capt. Joseph Hoxie, was valued at $90,000, besides which she had on board a valuable cargo.

The Ship White Squall was nearly new, and cost $100,000

THE OYSTER TRADE IN MARYLAND.—According to the Baltimore American, the product of the oyster trade of that city is equal to or greater than the product of all the wheat and corn raised in the State of Maryland. The whole shores of the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries are adapted to the growth of the oyster, and as but one year is required for their full growth, an immense profit accrues to those engaged in the business—a profit which is estimated at some three hundred to six hundred per cent. There are 250 vessels engaged in the business, which average about 900 bushels to the cargo, and require nine or ten days to the trip. These vessels, making in the aggregate 6,000 trips during the eight months in which they are engaged, give a total of 4,800,000 bushels per year sold in the Baltimore market. The oysters bring an average price of 50 cents per bushel, which gives a grand total of $2,400,000 per year paid for oysters by the dealers in that city. Some of the houses send by the Baltimore and Ohio and Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroads, to say nothing of the other modes of transportation, from eight to twelve tuns of "canned" oysters per day. The shells are carried, for manure, to all parts of Virginia and North Carolina. In the "shocking" of oysters, the shells will increase about one-fourth, which would give a total of about 6,000,000 bushels of shells, which sell for two cents per bushel, making a return of $120,000 per year for the shells alone.

UNIFORM RAILROAD TIME.—Professor Alexander Hall, of Lloydsville, Ohio, has exhibited in New York a new invention, which bids fair to be one of the most important of this telegraphic age; for it is to give a perfect uniform clock time at every station upon any line, or all the railroad lines in the United States. For example; a small brass clock, of a new and very simple construction, provided with a common horse-shoe magnet of about a pound weight, as a part of the works, with a pendulum, is moved by a magnetic battery, and by connection of a wire running from the moving power through all the clocks on the line, that one pendulum regulates the whole; and all will run with perfect uniformity as long as the battery gives forth its power. So that a regulator clock at New York, with a line of wire to Buffalo, would move the second, minute and hour hand upon clock-faces at every station exactly as they move at New York; and as that would be the time with which all Conductors' watches must conform, there would be no chance of collision in consequence of variation of time. Several of the most terrible accidents recorded within the last year have been owing to this cause. That upon the Camden and Amboy Road, where several lives and limbs were lost, was owing to the difference of five minutes between conductors' watches. That on the Providence and Worcester Road, to a variation of only one minute; and that one minute cost several lives and made many cripples for life, and mulcted the company in $150,000 damages. AGRICULTURAL PREMIUMS.—The Wisconsin State Agricultural Society makes offer of the following premiums: 1. For the most approved Agricultural work on farm husbandry generally, not less than 50 pages in length, of practical value, and adapted to popular use, a premium of $50 will be awarded. 2. For the most approved essay on any branch of Agriculture, of practical value, and adapted to popular use, a premium of $50 will be awarded. In this last case the subject to be of the writer's own choosing, either upon stock raising, wool growing, dairy, horticulture, management of farms, manures, wheat, field crops, or any other subject he may select. In this last case, should more than one essay he presented which, in the opinion of the Committee, is worthy of a premium, the premium offered will be divided. The essays to be without signature, and to be sent on or before the 1st of February next, in a sealed envelop, directed to the Corresponding Secretary of the Society.

REMITTING MONEY BY MAIL.—An important decision has recently been made in the U. S. District Court, Richmond, Va., Chief Justice Taney presiding. In a case on trial before that Court, the question arose whether money remitted by mail from a debtor to a creditor, such money being lost before it reached its destination, was a release of the debtor from obligations of the debt. The Chief Justice decided that the plaintiff having requested his debtor to remit the money, without specifying or directing how it was to be sent, and the defendant having complied with the request by remitting through the mail, as was the custom with others to do, the debtor would not be held liable to make good the loss. The decision is in conflict with other cases involving the same principle, the Chief Justice holding that the former decisions were not correct.

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.—The train on the New York Central Railroad, which left Buffalo at 5 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 29, was thrown off the track near Bergen, Genesee Co., either by the breaking of an axle or some other cause. One car filled with passengers was thrown completely off the track and turned upside down. The tender and two other cars were thrown off the track, and more or less shattered. Mr. H. McCoy, of Lockport, had his collar bone broken, and a severe wound in his head. Mrs. McCoy, several severe flesh wounds on her body and head. Sylvanus Payne, of Le Roy, had his head badly bruised and hip injured. Mrs. Payne, his wife, had five ribs broken, and is otherwise bruised. Mr. and Mrs. P. were married on Thursday, and, in company with Mr. and Mrs. McCoy, married about a week before, were going East on a wedding tour, which has been thus suddenly and sadly interrupted.

RAILROAD TROUBLES.—Railroad troubles at Erie, Pa., continue. The Cleveland Plain dealer says:—Two or three days ago a little child was frozen in its hands and feet while being carried round the 'break' at Erie. A passenger by the train last night informs us that an infant was also frozen in its hands and feet, under similar circumstances, yesterday. The distance which has to be traveled by omnibuses is six miles. There is no Station at Harbor Creek, where the passengers are obliged to debark from the cars. They are not only exposed to the cold air while shifting their baggage, but the whole ride to Erie is the chilliest and bleakest imaginable, being exposed to a constant cold wind from the Lake. It is a wonder that all the children and half the adults are not frozen to death!

GREAT STORM.—The Snow Storm in the Eastern States last week was one of the most severe ever known. For two or three days railroading was almost suspended. A train from Boston, with three locomotives, was 31 hours going to Springfield. On Friday morning a train of three locomotives left Providence depot on the Stonington Railroad, and got back at 6½ in the evening, having accomplished five miles. The snow was level with the top of the cars for the distance of a quarter of a mile in several places. Sad havoc was also made among the shipping.

A CHANCE FOR PHILOSOPHERS.—Samuel W. Adkinson, of Tennessee, offers various premiums of twenty-five dollars for solutions of the following problems:

I. To establish one principle in modern philosophy that assumes nothing as correct.

II. For a good reason why the bottom course of shingles should be only two double, and the rest three.

III. Why the front wheels of a wagon should be so low as to cause the front bolster to be lowest.

IV. Why the outer edge of the rim of a wagon-wheel should be thinner than the inner.

V. Why the inside of a horse-shoe should be concave, and have narrow heels.

SUMMARY.

Trouble continues at Erie, Pa., in relation to the change of guage on the Railroad. On Tuesday, Dec. 27, some officers of the Company went to Harbor Creek to superintend the repairs of the track injured by the mob the day before. On their arrival, some six or seven hundred armed men confronted them. Mr. Coflin, a conductor on the Buffalo and State Line Road, being recognized, was attacked; he succeeded in wounding one of the rioters in the head. The Railroad men then retreating to the cars, were intercepted, some badly maltreated, and one nearly killed. The mob then attacked the cars, swearing if they caught Mr. Dennis they would hang him to the first telegraph pole. Some of them forced the cars, and seized Mr. Dennis, but the train being started they jumped off.

By the arrival of the steamship Texas at New Orleans, dates from California to Dec. 7, have been received—one week later than the advices by the Northern Light. The mail steamship Winfield Scott, which left San Francisco on the 1st December for Panama, went ashore on the following day on the coast of Santa Barbara, and is a total loss. Her passengers and treasure were all saved, and arrived back in San Francisco on the 6th, and were immediately dispatched on board the steamer California for Panama. The ship Eclipse, of New York, was totally lost on the 20th Oct. 60 miles south of San Blas. Governor Stevens arrived at Oregon on the 29th November.

The emigration into Iowa the present season is astonishing and unprecedented. For miles and miles, day after day, the prairies of Illinois are lined with cattle and wagons, pushing on toward this prosperous State. At a point beyond Peoria, during a single month, 1,743 wagons had passed, and all for Iowa. Allowing five persons to a wagon, which is a fair average, would give 8,715 souls to the population. This being but the emigration of the month, and upon one route only out of many, it would not be an unreasonable assertion to say that 50,000 men, women and children, will have gone into that State by the first of December, reckoning from the 1st of December.

The Washington Star says that Hon. R. M. McLane, Minister to China, John Kettlewell, Naval Officer of the port of Baltimore, and other gentlemen of respectability, living in the city of Baltimore, have notified Mr. Martin, of the State Capitol Gazette, Annapolis, that unless he gives up the author of certain libelous communications which have recently been published in his journal, a suit for libel will be instituted. The author of the alledged libelous articles, the Star intimates, is a person who holds a responsible position under the present administration.

In 1853, there arrived at the port of New York from foreign ports 4,107 vessels, of which there were one frigate and one sloop of war, 213 steamships, 966 ships, 886 barks, 1,419 brigs, 613 schooners, seven galliots and one sloop. There were 2,591 American, 945 British, 47 French, and 194 German arrivals. The arrivals in 1852 were 3,822; in 1851, 3,888; in 1850, 3,487. The increase of 1853 over 1852 was 275; a decrease of 10,910 passengers, and an increase of 3,359 passengers from California.

Twenty-one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven deaths occurred in this City during the year 1853. Of these, 11,785 were males and 10,112 females. Of the children, we record 6,871 under one year of age, 2,976 from one to two, 2,302 from one to five, and 828 from five to ten—showing 12,977 deaths under ten years, besides 757 still-born for the last half year—making more than sixty per cent. of the whole mortality of children under ten.

The Wayne Democrat says that several water-spouts have recently made their appearance upon Lake Ontario. One of them, which was about thirty feet in diameter, was precipitated against the bluffs at Sodus Point, causing so great a commotion that large logs and lumber were torn from their moorings and swept far out into the lake. A portion of the pier of the lighthouse was also swept away, and considerable damage done to the building.

Ransel Lamb, the young man, foreman in the engraving house of Rawdon, Wright, Hatch & Edson, at Cincinnati, who was lately arrested on the charge of printing notes on the State Stock Bank, having plead guilty, has been sentenced to the Penitentiary for three years. James Jones, (a young man of excellent education and an accomplished pressman, who filled up the hills,) and James Kelly, Milton Parker, Wm. McGrea, and Lewis Dollman, all concerned in the same transaction, were sentenced to the Penitentiary for 10 years each.

Capt. Solomon Marsh, of Litchfield, has on his premises an apple tree which measures 14 feet around the trunk, and yielded the past season 20 bushels of good fruit. Previous to 1835 it yielded about one hundred bushels per year! The tree was brought from Hartford by the first settlers of Litchfield, and has borne delicious fruit one hundred and thirty years! So says the Litchfield Republican.

A bill to ascertain the will of the people of Tennessee in regard to the restraint of the sale of spirituous liquors, is now under discussion in the Senate of that State. The bill makes provision for submitting the question of "prohibition" or "no prohibition" to the people, in January, 1854, and seems to be intended simply to ascertain the will of the people on the subject, as no act of legislation is made to depend upon the result.

The Chicago and Rock Island Railroad has been completed to Geneseo, within 22 miles of Rock Island and the Mississippi River. The Directors are making extraordinary exertions to have it completed to Rock Island by the 10th of February. Then there will be a perfect railroad communication, under the control of one company, from the Mississippi to Chicago.

The whole number of persons arrested in New York City within the last twelve months, is nearly four thousand, 1,343 of whom, on having examinations and trials, were discharged. 223 men and 29 women have been sentenced to imprisonment in the State Prison, the aggregate time of sentence being 938 years and one month.

Messages were received in New York the other day, via the Morse New York, Albany and Buffalo Telegraph, direct from Chicago; and we learn that arrangements have been perfected by which messages will be hereafter sent between the two cities in a single circuit.

In the United States Circuit Court at Philadelphia, in the case of Harriet Beecher Stowe against F. W. Thomas, the German publisher in Philadelphia, who was charged with an infringement of the plaintiff's copy-right of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," by publishing a German translation of that work, Judge Grier decided that such translation was not an infringement of the plaintiff's copy-right.

There are now in operation in the United States 347 light houses; 27 are in the course of construction, and 44 more authorized, but not yet commenced. There are 44 light vessels in operation, and 5 in the course of construction. The estimate for this service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1855, is $905,161 43.

A dispatch dated Geneva, Thursday, Dec. 29, 1853, says: As the new propeller Watkins, of this place, was preparing to start on her regular trip up the Lake this morning, one of her flues burst, severely scalding Edmond Davis and Thomas Fish, firemen, and it is thought they cannot recover. The accident is attributed to a defect in the flue.

The Madison (Wis.) Journal notices the fact that there are two George B. Smiths in that place, and suggests that there will arise some difficulty as to which of the two is our Attorney-General elect.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. Miscellaneous.

Good Temper.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

There's not a cheaper thing on earth,
Nor yet one half so dear;
'Tis worth more than distinguished birth,
Or thousands gained a year.
It lends the day a new delight;
'Tis virtue's firmest shield;
And adds more beauty to the night
Than all the stars may yield.

It maketh poverty content;
To sorrow whispers peace;
It is a gift from Heaven sent,
For mortals to increase.
It meets you with a smile at morn;
It lulls you to repose;
A flower for peer and peasant born,
An everlasting rose.

A charm to [illegible] grief away,
To free [illegible] from care;
Turns tea[illegible]es, makes dullness gay—
Spreads [illegible] everywhere;
And yet 't[illegible] as summer-dew,
That ge[illegible]y's breast;
A talisman [illegible] as true
As ever [illegible]essed.

As smiles [illegible]ow through the cloud,
When th[illegible] storm begins—
As music [illegible] tempest loud,
That sti[illegible]et way wins—
As springs [illegible] across the tide,
Where [illegible]flicting foam—
So comes [illegible]raph to our side,
This ang[illegible] our home.

What may this wondrous spirit be,
With po[illegible] unheard before—
This charm [illegible] bright divinity?
Good nature—nothing more!
Good Temper—[illegible] the choicest gift
That woman homeward brings,
And can the poorest peasant lift
To bliss unknown to kings.

The Pacific Railroad.

The following is the Bill for the construction of a Railroad to the Pacific, introduced in the Senate of the United States, by Mr. Seward, Dec. 2[illegible]th:—

A BILL to Provide for the Construction of a Military and Postal Railroad through the Territories of the United States lying between the Atlantic States and the State of California:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—That a good and substantial first class double track railroad may and shall be constructed throughout the Territories of the United States north of the fortieth parallel of North latitude, from some point in the western boundary of some of the Atlantic States west of the Mississippi to some point in the eastern border of the State of California. The location and route of such railroad shall, within one year from the date of the contract hereinafter mentioned, be fixed and determined by the company who shall, in manner hereinafter mentioned, contract with the United States for the construction of the same. The public land necessary for the bed of such road, of a width to be determined by the Secretary of War, is hereby ceded and granted to the said company for the period that they shall exist and continue to work and operate such road in conformity to this act. The said railroad shall be commenced within eighteen months from the date of such contract, and shall be completed within five years thereafter, and one-fifth part thereof, having relation to the estimated cost of the entire construction and equipment thereof, shall be completed within each of the said five years. The road may be constructed by any company or association who, having been duly incorporated by the Legislature of any one of the United States with powers for that purpose, shall obtain the contract with the United States hereinafter mentioned. The Secretary of War shall immediately after the passage of this act issue and publish in each of the cities of the United States for the term of —— weeks, a notice inviting sealed proposals for the construction of the said railroad according to the conditions and provisions of this act, and at the expiration of that time the proposals shall be opened, and the said Secretary shall then award and make a contract of that date for the construction of the said railroad to and with the company who shall have proposed to contract the same upon the terms most favorable to the United States according to the provision of this act, and shall comply with the said provision in regard to the execution of the contract. The said contract shall bind the United States to pay the said company the sum so bid by the said company, being the lowest sum bid by any company complying with the provision herein contained, in the manner and at the times hereafter mentioned, in money or in five per cent. stock of the United States, redeemable after twenty years at the pleasure of the United States. The company who shall so contract shall, when executing the contract, deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, in money or in State stocks, or in stocks of the United States, at par value, five millions of dollars as security for the performance of the contracts. They shall receive to their own use the interest on such moneys and stocks, provided that the United States will pay no more interest thereon than the rate of interest which the said stocks bear, and which shall actually be received in case of State stocks. Whenever the company shall fail to carry on the construction and equipment of said road as is hereinbefore provided, they shall forfeit to the use of the United States one hundred thousand dollars of the moneys and stocks so deposited for every month such default shall continue. When the work shall have been completed within the period before mentioned, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then the moneys or stocks so deposited, or the portion thereof remaining after such forfeitures, shall be repaid and delivered to said company. The company constructing the said railroad shall within the said period of five years fully and adequately equip the same and put it into operation. They shall enjoy to their own use, for fifty years, the profits and emoluments of the said road, but they shall nevertheless at all times transport the mails, the troops, and the military and naval stores and munitions of war of the United States at reasonable rates, to be determined by the Department requiring such transportation, and Congress shall have the right at any time to reduce the tolls and fares to be charged for passengers and freight, if they shall think necessary, so, however, as to allow always a profit of ten per cent. upon the actual investment of the company, and the United States may also, by an act of Congress, resume the said road and all the franchises hereby granted, on paying to the said company the moneys which they shall have actually expended in making and equipping said road, exclusive of the moneys and stocks received from the United States, with ten per cent. interest per annum thereon. The company contracting for the construction of the said railroad shall expend thereon actually and in good faith one million of dollars of its own moneys before it shall be entitled to receive any money from the United States. The whole amount of the probable cost of the said road shall be ascertained and certified by the chief of the Topographical Bureau of the United States, and when such sum of one million of dollars shall have been so expended by the company to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then the Treasurer of the United States shall, on the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, pay to said company such sum as in relation to the whole sum to be paid by the United States shall bear the same proportion as one million of dollars to be expended by the company shall bear to the whole amount of the estimated cost of the said railroad, exclusively of the moneys to be paid by the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, that the Secretary of War shall set apart and lay out into village and city lots sufficient plots of ground, at the several places which shall be fixed upon by the Engineers of said company or by himself, for depots and stations, and any such lands shall thereafter be sold as other public lands are sold, but only on due notice and for the highest terms that can be obtained. The price of the public lands, within the distance of six miles on each side of the said road, and not included within said village and city plots, is hereby fixed at two dollars and fifty cents per acre, and the price of public lands lying more than six miles and not less than twelve miles distant from the track of the said road on either side thereof is hereby fixed at one dollar and eighty-seven cents per acre.

Life of the Westpoint Cadet.

He sleeps in the barracks, in a room with one other; at five in the morning in summer, and at half past five in the winter, the reveille awakens him; he immediately arises, doubles up his blankets and mattrass, and places them on the head of his iron bedstead; he studies until seven o'clock; at that hour the drum beats for breakfast, and the cadets fall into rank and proceed to the mess hall. Twenty minutes is the usual time spent at breakfast. Guard-mounting takes place at half past seven, and twenty-four are placed on guard every day. At eight o'clock the bugle sounds and the recitations commence. At one o'clock the bugle again sounds, the professors dismiss their respective stations, the cadets form ranks opposite the barracks, and march to dinner. Between eleven and one, a part of the cadets are occupied in riding, and others in fencing, daily. After dinner they have until two o'clock for recreation. At four the bugle sounds and they go either to battalion or light artillery drill. This exercise lasts an hour and a half. After that they devote the time to recreation until parade, which takes place at sunset. After parade, they form into rank in front of the barracks, and the names of the delinquents are read by an officer of the cadets. Supper comes next, and after supper recreation until eight o'clock, when the bugle sounds to call to quarters, and every cadet must be found in his room within a few minutes at study, and must remain there thus employed until half past nine. At half past nine the bugle again sounds; this is called tattoo; and at the drum taps, every cadet must be in bed, having his light extinguished, and must remain there until morning. If during the night, the cadet is found to be absent from his room more than thirty minutes, and does not give a satisfactory account of himself, charges are preferred against him and he is court-martialed.

The use of intoxicating drink and of tobacco is strictly repudiated; so are playing at chess, wearing whiskers, and a great many other things. The punishment to which cadets are liable are privation of recreation, &c., extra hours of duty, reprimands, arrests, or confinement to his room or tent; confinement in a light prison, confinement in a dark prison, dismission with the privilege of resigning, and public dismission.

Through the months of July and August the cadets are encamped, and during the encampment the instruction is exclusively military. The only furlough allowed to cadets, is two months when they are in the third class.

The pay of the cadet is twenty-four dollars per month, and his board costs him ten of this. From the balance he is required to dress and defray his other expenses, and he is prohibited from contracting debts without.

As the reward for his labor and deprivation, the cadet acquires an excellent education—in mathematics better, probably, than he can get at any other institution in the country. The training here, of both body and mind, is very thorough and complete.

The Circassian Cavalry.

The noble Circassians who have been fighting against Russia, independently of Turkey, and who have long set at defiance the whole power of the Autocrat, have, within a short time, been taken into the Turkish army. A description of this remarkable cavalry may, therefore, be interesting at this time, as they are, probably, to play a conspicuous part in the present war between Russia and Turkey. It is by a Prussian officer, who seems familiar with them and their mode of warfare. He says, they wear a pointed steel helmet, with a long horsetail pendant from it. A net of steelwork hangs down from the lower part of the helmet, protects the front and nape of the neck, and is looped together under the chin, underneath a short vest, cut in the Polish fashion. He is clad in a species of a coat of mail, consisting of small bright rings of steel intervened. His arms, from the wrist to the elbow, and his legs, from the front of the shin bone to the knee, are guarded by thin plates of steel. He also wears close pantaloons and laced boots, two long Turkish pistols, as well as a poignard, are stuck into his girdle. He has a leather strap, with a noose like a Mexican lasso, hanging at his side, with he throws with great dexterity, over the head of his enemy. A Turkish sabre and a long Turkish musket are slung behind his back, and two cartridge holders across his breast. The skill with which the Circassians use their weapons is really beyond belief. He states that he has seen them repeatedly fire at a card lying on the ground, at full speed without missing. They will pick up a piece of money from the ground while executing a charge, by bending themselves round below the horse's belly, and after seizing the piece, suddenly throw themselves into the saddle. They form the choicest body of cavalry in the Turkish service, and when charging, they attack their opponents with a sabre in each hand, managing their reins with their mouth, they will spring out of their saddles, take aim and fire from behind their horses then jump into their saddles again, whirl round and reload their guns as they retreat at full speed. They are perfect madmen in the attack, and few troops could withstand the utter recklessness of danger they evince.

Paper from Cane and Pine Wood.

We have just examined, (says the Baltimore Sun,) several samples of paper made of reeds or cane, of a species which grows in great abundance in our Southern States; and also a sample made by the same process from white pine shavings. In such an age of invention as this, incredulity is not to be tolerated; therefore, we submit with the best possible grace, even to the white pine. The reed paper is quite a promising article, approaching in quality, under the second experiment, to that on which the daily Sun is now printed, both in color and texture. Another sample, composed of rags and reeds, one-third of the former and two-thirds of the latter, is quite a fine article, and its value is estimated by the makers to equal that from rags worth 12½ cents per pound. The paper from pine shavings is designed for wrapping or envelop paper; it was first bleached and then colored for that purpose, and is valued at 12½ cents per pound also.

Paper has been made within a few years past from several substances, and with various success. A small quantity made from straw was recently worked in the regular edition of a daily paper in a neighboring city, and as the result of an original experiment was considered quite encouraging. The effort now brought to our attention is highly creditable, and has the promise of entire success. The gentlemen entitled to the credit of it are B. A. Lavender, Esq., and Mr. Henry Lowe, an analytical chemist of this city. They have been experimenting for some months upon the material employed, making finished samples of paper from time to time, which we have occasionally seen, and the improvement is considerable. They are sanguine, that with proper apparatus, paper can be manufactured of reeds or wood, as the main staple, by their process, worth 12½ cents to 16 cents, and at a cost not exceeding 6¼ cents per pound.

The subject is of manifest importance and worthy the attention of capitalists, in view of the fast and increasing demand for paper, the scarcity of the material of which paper is at present made, and the boundless supply of the cane in our southern country.

Titles in the Turkish Empire.

The frequent use of the words "Sultan," "Porte," &c., &c., in the newspapers publishing accounts of affairs in Turkey at the present time, are erroneously understood by many persons.

"The Sublime Porte," is the official title of the Government of the Ottoman Empire, and not the title of any officer of the government, as many suppose it to be.

The Ottoman Emperor is called Sultan, or Grand Sultan, or Grand Seignior, according to the fancy of the person speaking or writing. They all mean the same thing.

Pacha is the governor of a province, and according to the importance of his province, he is distinguished by one or two or three tails. Every Pacha has his own army in his own province, distinct from the grand army of the Empire. A Pacha with three tails has the power to punish with death any agent whom he employs, or any individual who seems to threaten the general safety.

Bey is a sub-governor under the Pacha.

The Divan is the Council of State, and consists of the principal ministers.

The Reis Effendi is high chancellor of the Empire, and stands at the head of all the body of attorneys—which body is thought to contain the best informed men of the nation.

Cadi is a sort of judge or justice of the peace. To order the bastinado on common people, to impose a fine on a rich Greek or European, to condemn a thief to be hanged, is about all the duty of an ordinary Cadi.

The Royal Family of Russia.

Peter I., the founder, as he may be called, of the present imperial family, was the murderer of the two daughters and sons of his brother Ivan, and the murderer, it is asserted, according to more than one of the annalists of his reign, by his own hand, of Alexis. He was himself murdered by Menzikoff, (a name that has again risen up in history,) the favorite of his wife Catherine, who when united to Peter was already the wife of a living husband, and their children were afterwards declared incapable of reigning, because born in sin. Anne, the eldest daughter of Ivan, put 14,000 Russians to death, and banished twice as many. A revolution displaced the younger Ivan, to put on the throne Elizabeth, daughter of Peter I., and her reign was remarkable for her drunkenness and debauchery. Peter III., her successor, was notoriously the offspring of crime, and was dethroned and strangled by his wife, Catherine II., the same infamous woman who had assassinated the dethroned Emperor Ivan, and whose own son Paul—the father of the present Emperor Nicholas—was strangled by his courtiers.

Chaplains to Congress.

The Chaplains elected this year, are both Methodist clergymen. The Rev. Mr. Slicer, who was elected by the Senate, is said to be a politician, as well as a minister, as much at home on the stump as in the pulpit. Rev. Mr. Milburn, who is elected Chaplain of the House, is a man of different stamp, and was elected on other grounds. He is only about thirty years of age, of decided ability, eloquent in his calling, and of most amiable, excellent, and social character. For some years he has suffered from disease in his eyes, which renders him nearly blind. Some five or six years ago he was chosen Chaplain of the House, and gave universal satisfaction. The circumstances of his election at that time, as we have heard them narrated, were curious and creditable. He was traveling on one of the Western rivers in a steamboat, being upon one of his preaching circuits. He was but about twenty-two years of age, and seemed even younger. A great number of members of Congress were on board, on their way to Washington, and had drawn a good deal of attention to themselves by card-playing, drinking, and profanity. As Sunday came round, Mr. Milburn was asked to preach, which he did. In the course of his sermon, he addressed himself directly to the members of Congress, and rebuked them in the severest terms, for the reproach their conduct was calculated to bring upon the country, in the eyes of the public at large, and enforced upon them the duty of remembering the responsibilities which rested upon them. He retired to his room, believing that he had offended them, fearful that he had overstepped the bounds of propriety, but conscious that he had discharged his duty. Soon afterwards a committee, appointed by the members, called upon him, thanked him for his reproofs, solicited his acceptance of a purse of money they had made up, and asked permission to present his name as a candidate for Chaplain of the House of Representatives. His assent was given, and he was elected.

SOUTHERN TIMBER GOING NORTH.—The great increase in ship building has caused the employment of a large fleet of vessels in bringing oak and pine timber and plank from the southern to the northern States. In Virginia, Georgia, North Carolina and Florida, considerable tracts of timber land has been purchased by northern ship builders, who have erected saw-mills and prepare much of the timber they require near the spot where it is cut from the forest, and then charter vessels to convey it to the ship-yards of the north. Great numbers of men from Maine are at the present time engaged in getting out this timber and plank, in all the Southern States named above, and a few are also in South Carolina. The Gardiner Transcript says parties for this work are leaving Bath every few days, and several weeks since, a party of 100 men started from Richmond, on the Kennebec, where they had rendezvoused for the same destination. Last week, a party of thirty picked men left Gardiner for Florida, and another party is about starting for Virginia, both for the purpose of cutting ship timber for the builders on the Kennebec.

A TEXAS SNAKE STORY.—One night my wife and myself were awakened by a noise from the shelf which contained our store of crockery, followed by a crash, showing that a great portion of our cups and plates had been thrown to the floor. Springing up to discover the author of this 'attack upon China,' I found a large snake in a somewhat unpleasant fix. He had crawled upon the shelf, attracted by a number of eggs, which were scattered about. One of them he had swallowed, and in order to get at the next, he had put his head and a portion of his body through the handle of a jug which happened to stand between him and the coveted delicacies. The handle was large enough to let his body, in its natural state, slip cleverly through, but not sufficiently large to let it pass through when puffed out by the egg. In this position he had swallowed the second egg. His snakeship thus found himself unable to advance or retreat, and in floundering about to escape from this novel stock, had caused the accident which had aroused us.

SINGULAR PHENOMENON.—The Belfast Journal says that in a portion of the Penobscot River, a short distance above Prospect Ferry, where the river widens to the breadth of about a mile, a great commotion was discovered in the water several months since, so that the surface was much disturbed, and stones and earth seemed to be thrown up from the bottom. This upboiling still continues at intervals, and experiments show that at least an acre of the river-bed has sunk from a depth of seven to a depth of fourteen fathoms. A sulphuric gas is emitted from the water during its periods of commotion, and it is said that two distinct shocks of an earthquake have occurred since the commencement of the phenomena. These disturbances are undoubtedly of volcanic origin, though the phenomenon is very remarkable for this region.

EFFECTS OF WRONG SPELLING.—Not long since, a gentleman, then a chorister of a certain choir in Vermont, wrote to a publisher in Boston for a copy of that popular singing-book, 'The Ancient Lyre.' In his communication, he used the following language:—

'Please send me the Ancient Liar, well bound.'

The publisher, in answer to his request, replied:—

'My Dear Sir—I do not doubt but the devil has been, and still is, in Boston; but it will be difficult to comply with your request, for the reason that Boston influence is so strongly in his favor, it will be impossible to bind him.'

TO CLEANSE THE HAIR.—What is far better for cleansing the hair than the spiritous extracts so frequently recommended, is the yolk of an egg; it acts in the same way as soap in removing dandruff, but having little or no alkaline qualities, does not, like soap, change the color of the hair, nor does it render it harsh as spirits do; but, on the contrary, makes it soft and silk-like. It is used thus: Beat up the yolk of an egg—perfectly free from white—with an equal quantity of soft water or rose water, apply it to the hair with a soft brush—a shaving brush is best—until a good lather is produced; then clean it well off, either with soft water, rose, elder, or orange flower water. If a new laid egg, the better.

There are at the Daguerrian Gallery of Mr. Root, corner of Broadway and Franklin-st., N. Y., a number of very interesting views of the most renowned places of the earth. They are large and well executed Daguerreotypes of the City of Jerusalem from Mount Olivet, of Bethlehem of Judea, the Convent at Bethlehem, Nazareth, Mount Zion, and Mount Calvary. These views are the first actual sun-pictures from the real scenery ever brought to this country. A Sterescope of the Holy City has been made, and by it one can see every prominent feature as vividly as if he really stood upon Olivet. The pictures were sent to this City, with others, for the World's Exhibition, by the American Consul at Jerusalem.

Col. John L. Goldschmidt died at Watertown, N. Y., on Thursday last, aged 64 years. His life was an extraordinary one, full of strange scenes, comprising almost every degree of adventure, hardship and peril. Originally, he was designed and educated for the ministry, but entered the army with a lieutenant of cavalry's commission. He was subsequently through the whole Peninsular war; first in the disastrous campaign of the brave but ill-fated Sir John More, and afterward participating in the more brilliant career of the Duke of Wellington, then Sir Arthur Wellesley, with whom he eventually became intimately acquainted, and was honored by him with the position of Aid in several engagements.

VARIETY.

Dr. Spring says that neatness and taste are peculiarly ornamental to female character. In a female, particularly, they well deserve the name of virtues; for, without them, whatever may be her excellence, she has none that will be honored or acknowledged. A woman may be industrious and economical; she may possess a well-cultivated and richly-furnished mind, but, destitute of neatness and taste, depresses rather than elevates the character of her sex—and poisons instead of purifying the fountain of domestic and public happiness.

The only people that hope are the poor. The rich live in fear. Reduce a man to one pair of breeches, and his view of futurity will be as buoyant as a cork. Make him a millionaire and he will worry from year end to year end. Every gale of wind not only sinks his vessel but his spirits; and the same conflagration that only breaks the nap of the shirtless loafer, fills the mind of the rich man with fear and trembling for the stock he owns in some insurance company.

At the breaking of ground for the commencement of the Lynchburg and Tennessee Railroad at Lynchburg, a clergyman present commenced slowly and solemnly to read a manuscript prayer. At the conclusion, an old negro man, who had been resting with one foot on his spade and his arms on the handle, looking intently in the chaplain's face, straightening himself up, remarked audibly, "Well, I reckon dat's de fust time de Lord has ever been written to on de subject of railroads!"

The bark N. H. Wolf, which arrived from Alexandretta, Syria, on Monday, has thirty-seven boxes consigned to the cabinets of several of the colleges in the United States, and to private cabinets, containing specimens of the arts of the ancient Ninevites, which have been brought to light by the labors of Layard and Rawlinson, under the direction of the British Museum, after having lain buried in those ancient ruins for twenty-five or thirty centuries.

The New York Knickerbocker says:—The following telegraphic dispatch was recently sent to the Rev. P. R., Saint Peter's Church, Montreal, in answer to the urgent request, addressed to a well-known glass-stainer in this city, that certain cathedral windows should at once be forwarded:—"Saint Peter left New York this day; the Virgin and Joseph go on Saturday; and the other Saints will leave early next week."

I have often occasion to observe (said Cecil) that a warm blundering man does more for the world than a frigid wise man. A man who gets into the habit of inquiring about properties and expediencies and occasions, spends his life without doing anything to the purpose. The state of the world is such, and so much depends on action, that every thing seems to say to every man, "Do something"—"Do it"—"Do it."

He alone is truly great who is so by virtue of intrinsic qualities. The adroit employment of artifice and falsehood may for a time deceive; but that fine intuition which tests character and worth with infalliable sagacity, will reverse the decision of mere opinion, and estimate the man as he is.

If a well bred woman is surprised in careless costume, she does not try to dodge behind the door to conceal deficiencies, nor does she turn red or stammer confused excuses. She remains calm and self-possessed, and makes up in dignity what she may want in decoration.

The editor of the Smithland (Ky.) Postboy makes the following confession: "We have had numerous fights in town during the week; some very interesting, and some not so much so. We attended one or two ourself, and have got a certificate of our attendance in the shape of a black patch over the left eye. See what a man's curiosity brings him to."

The Philadelphia Register, in urging a speedy construction of such railroads as are important to the interests of that city, says, the fact is not to be disguised, that the vortex of New York capital, enterprise, and character, is dragging into it the trade of every section of the Union.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD.

To Rev. J. McCandlish, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Lewistown:

Considering ourselves as having been repeatedly rebuked in public as Sabbath-breakers, in your discourses, particularly in that of yesterday, (Oct. 2, 1853,) in the school-house in our vicinity, we think it time that you forbear, or that we repent. You must be aware that, from some motive, we endeavor to sanctify the seventh or last day of the week, according to the manner enjoined in the Fourth Commandment, and practiced by Jesus Christ and his apostles. In so doing, we are aware that we shut ourselves out from many lucrative callings and honorable situations, which otherwise we might be as eligible to as others of similar abilities; but we do it, we think, from the fear of God, and with regard to the retributions of eternity. But now, if you, or any other person, will make the way plain for us, so that we can, without conscientious scruples, devote to labor the seventh day, and also enable us to esteem the first day as "the holy of the Lord," we hope immediately to reform. The difficulties in the way, may be gathered from the following queries:

1st. You told us, that the ten commandments were delivered to more than two millions of hearers, by God's own voice, from the summit of Sinai—and now, we think, if one word is to be altered, it should be done in the same public manner. Will you show that "first day" has been substituted for "seventh day" in such a public manner?

2d. You showed that the ten commandments were engraved on tables of stone by the finger of God. Will you show that "seventh day" was not so engraved, but was only written with ink, that it might be blotted out in the fullness of time, like the Jewish ritual? or will you show how God can be "without variableness or shadow of turning," (James 1: 17,) if he alter one word publicly proclaimed to millions, and twice engraved with his own finger on tables of stone?

3d. If the seventh day observance was designed by God to be succeeded by the first day, we ask, 1st. Why was not the Fourth Commandment excluded from the decalogue, like circumcision, and other observances, never intended for the Gentiles under the gospel? 2d. Why are we informed, in the only place where the prophets intimate a change of times and laws, that the change should be by a power adverse to the Saints of the Most High, and that it should not be perpetual? (Daniel 7: 25.) 3d. If the Fourth Commandment was to be altered by divine authority, why did Jesus Christ say, It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail? (Luke 16: 17.) Why are we constantly directed in the New Testament, to "follow Christ," who, as his adversaries had to admit, kept the Sabbath—the same seventh-day Sabbath that the Jews did, and never, so far as we are informed, observed the first day at all as a season of rest or a Sabbath. 5th. If a commandment of the Decalogue might, under pretence of piety to God, be altered with impunity, why did our Lord prepare such a severe scourge for the perpetrators of such a deed, as is to be found in the 15th of Matthew and the 17th of Mark, where notice is taken of an infringement on the Fifth Commandment, with as plausible a reason, perhaps, as man could devise for infringing upon any? "Honor thy father and thy mother," said God. But hypocrisy said, Though your parents need your support, you may take the property you properly owe for their sustenance, and cast it into the treasury of the Lord, your great Father in heaven, and then say to your parents, It is corban, and let them beg or die, but you are free. 6th. Why did our Lord say, that on love to God, and love to man, hang all the law, (Mat. 22: 40,) if the seventh day of the Fourth Commandment was not affixed thereto? 7th. Why did he say, (Mark 2: 27) The Sabbath (which he knew the Fourth Commandment declared to be the seventh day) was made for man, thus teaching that it was made for mankind in general, if He intended it to be superseded by another, the "first day," in a few years? And why did He own himself to be Lord of the Sabbath, thus making it the true Lord's day, and Christian Sabbath, if it was not then so, and so to remain? 8th. We are informed, (1 John 3: 4,) that "whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law, for sin is the transgression of the law;" and if Mat. 7: 23 is correctly rendered, it may read thus, "And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work trangression of the law;" and Matt. 13: 41 thus, "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do transgress the law." Is this true? And if so, why has Christ thus spoken, but to show that the law would be transgressed both by teachers and people, in his kingdom, at their awful peril, and his supreme displeasure?

4th. If the Apostles knew that the first day was the Sabbath, or a Sabbath after the resurrection of Jesus Christ, why did Paul say, "The prophets were read to the Jews every Sabbath day?" (Acts 13: 27.) And why did James say, (Acts 15: 21,) "Moses of old time hath in every city, them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath day?" And why did Luke, the writer of the Acts say, (Acts 18: 4,) "And he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks?" Did the unbelieving Jews keep first day for Sabbath, keeping, as they did, every Sabbath day; or did these Apostles testify falsely; or do they who now say that first day became the Sabbath at the resurrection of Christ?

5th. If the weekly return of the time of Christ's resurrection is to be kept holy, where is the precept for it, or where an example in holy record, and what was the hour and the moment? for it occupied not a day, like the example of Sabbath rest, for, at the rising of the sun, the event had already transpired.

6th. If the weekly Sabbath is intended in Col. 2: 16, "Let no man judge you in respect to the Sabbath days," ought we not to disavow all human authority on the subject, and simply conform to the authority of God, and of Jesus Christ, as it is written, "We ought to obey God rather than man?" (Acts 5: 29.)

7th. As the mystery of iniquity (lawlessness) was at work in Paul's time, (2 Thess. 2: 7,) is it safe to follow the Fathers, as they are called, in any thing at variance with the holy commandment delivered unto us?

8th. When God says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath," will you show us how we can say, The first day is the Sabbath, and neither lie ourselves, nor give God the lie?

9th. When God says, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt do no work," (Ex. 20: 9,) will you show how we can live without trangression, if we refuse to work on either of the first six days of the week, or refuse to rest on the seventh?

10th. If the Apostles and primitive Christians left the observance of seventh day for that of first day, how happened it that those who contended so hard for circumcising gentile converts should not have one word to say on this subject? And why were they never accused, after Christ's resurrection, of being violators of the Sabbath, by unbelieving and persecuting Jews? Or how could Paul, (Acts 24: 14,) say he believed all things written in the law, if he did not believe that the seventh day was then the Sabbath? Or how say (Acts 25: 8,) "Against the law of the Jews have I offended nothing at all?

11th. When you say that Christ, after his resurrection, repeatedly met with his disciples on the first day of the week, do you mean that he happened at any appointed meeting on that day? If so, where is the proof? Or do you simply mean, that on first day He showed himself first to Peter, second to Mary, third, that he traveled sixty furlongs to Emmaus with two disciples, and, fourth, then returned to Jerusalem, and at evening showed himself to the ten, when they sat with closed doors for fear of the Jews? If this is all, please show how it binds us to keep that day as a day of rest, more than the ninth day after, when he met Thomas with the rest of the Apostles, or more than to keep every day for forty days in succession, as he was thus seen of them. (Acts 1: 3.)

12th. You mention the meeting at Troas on the first of the week, "day" being, as you know, confessedly supplied, both here and elsewhere where first day occurs in our version of the Scriptures, as is shown by the translators placing it in italic. Now, can you prove that this meeting commenced before evening? If not, might it not have been the evening after seventh day worship, and Paul started on his journey on first day morning? As the Lord's Supper was instituted in the evening, it seems not at all improbable that they attended to it in the evening on that account.

13th. You farther mention 1 Cor. 16: 2, "Upon the first day of the week, let every one of them lay by him in store as God hath prospered him," &c. Have you any proof that this service too was not designed for the evening after the seventh day service? as they are said to have reckoned the day to commence at evening, as it is written, "The evening and the morning were the first day." (Gen. 1: 5.) After their hearts had been warmed with the holy exercises of the church on the Sabbath, and the wants of the poor saints had been presented to their minds, they might return home, and at evening, when the Sabbath was passed, sit down, and each look over his gain and loss, and without letting his left hand know what his right hand did, lay by him in store his charity, to be ready when called for. But how does the circumstance prove the day a Sabbath, or a worship day?

14th. You say that John was in the spirit on the Lord's day. (Rev. 1: 10.) Can you prove that that day was not the very seventh-day Sabbath, of which Christ said that he was Lord? for you must mark, that he made the world (Heb. 1: 2, John 1: 3,) and rested on the seventh day, and afterwards made propitiation for our sins by his sufferings; and when it was finished, he bowed his head and gave up the ghost, and rested, according to general tradition, as well as the Scripture, on the seventh day from all his sufferings—his body in the tomb, and his soul in paradise; and at the same time, his affectionate female followers rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment. (Luke 23: 56.)

Are these all your scripture evidences for a change? and must we not be children, carried about with every wind of doctrine, to let them outweigh in our minds the united force of all the Scriptures of truth?

15th. The Sabbath you call also a figure of future blessedness. The Apostle Paul, it seems, taught the same sentiment, (Heb. 4: 9,) saying, "There remaineth therefore (that is, because of this future rest or blessedness) a rest, (margin, a keeping of a Sabbath,) to the people of God." Then why should not that Sabbath follow our toil, as we hope that blessedness will follow all the labors of life?—for to have our rest before our labor, might signify that, like the rich man, we have our good things in this life, and our evil things in the future.

16th. What adverse power is that mentioned in Dan. 7: 25? And are we authorized to follow his change in times and laws?

17th. Does spiritual fornication consist in embracing human authority, rather than that of God, or not?

18th. What power is meant by the "mother of harlots," in Rev. 17: 5? And what corrupt powers are the harlots? And should we not beware of being seduced, either by the mother or the daughters?

19th. To close—is it wrong for us to assimilate to those mentioned in Rev. 12; 17, and 14: 12, and 22: 14, "who keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus?"

And now we offer, for the first written tract, to be presented to us on or before the first day of January, 1855, which shall so dispose of the foregoing queries as to satisfy us that God, in the holy Scriptures, requires us to follow our labors on the last day of the week, and to rest on the first day of the week, the sum of five hundred dollars; and we implore editors of newspapers every where, who either fear God or love our Lord Jesus Christ, or have any regard for religious truth, or any sympathy for sufferers for conscience sake, to give the foregoing a place in their columns.

THE DYING BED.

YOUNG says: "In life and health we think with men, but on a dying bed, with God." How often do we see this illustrated! What a change comes over the views of those who are brought to the verge of eternity! How differently do they admit they would have acted, had they but always viewed things in the light which is cast upon them in the valley and shadow of death! A ministerial friend writes us of one of his parishioners, just deceased: "His protracted illness prepared us all for the change. He died on the ——, with his family and friends around him. He expressed regret, just before his death, that he had not united with the church, and thus made an open profession of religion. I have no doubt he was a good man, although in error as to his duty. His life would have done honor to a Christian, except in one respect—his neglect of a public profession of religion. He assured me no other reason had deterred him, but a deep sense of his utter unworthiness of the privilege, and of his unfitness to perform the duties of a member of the church. This was an error of judgment, to say the least; and his course, in this respect, he regretted the night before he died."

Here is a lesson for us all, viz. not to neglect obedience to the plain commands of Christ, lest we plant thorns in our dying pillow; but especially is there warning and instruction for those who secretly indulge the hope that they are Christians, and yet hesitate and delay to confess Christ before men, by identifying themselves in a public profession of religion with the cause and people of God. It is not a case of worthiness, but of faith and obedience; and he who neglects so plain a duty, may be sure that he will deeply regret it in a dying hour. We have known the individual above referred to for many years, and have often urged this duty upon him, and felt that he needed nothing else to afford the most cheering evidence of his discipleship. We would that all who occupy the position he did, might but for a moment, in imagination, throw themselves forward upon a dying bed, and obtain the views of duty which he then had, and which will then assuredly flash upon them in the near prospect of an exchange of worlds.

DULL CHILDREN.

No fact can be plainer than this: It is impossible to judge correctly of the genius or intellectual ability of the future man by the indications of childhood. Some of the most eminent men of all ages were remarkable only for dullness in their youth. Sir Isaac Newton in his boyhood was inattentive to all study, and ranked very low in school until the age of twelve. When Samuel Wythe, the Dublin schoolmaster, attempted to educate Richard Brinsley Sheridan, he pronounced the boy an "incorrigible dunce." The mother of Sheridan fully concurred in this verdict, and declared him the most stupid of her sons. Goldsmith was dull in his youth, and Shakspeare, Gibbon, Davy, and Dryden, do not appear to have exhibited in their childhood even the common elements of future success.

When Berzelius, the eminent Swedish chemist, left school for the university, the words, "Indifferent in behavior and of doubtful hope," were scored against his name; and after he entered the university, he narrowly escaped being turned back. On one of his first visits to the laboratory, when nineteen years old, he was taunted with the inquiry whether he "understood the difference between a laboratory and a kitchen." Walter Scott had the credit of having "the thickest skull in the school," though Dr. Blair told the teacher that many bright rays of future genius shone through that same "thick skull."

Milton and Swift were justly celebrated for stupidity in childhood. The great Isaac Barrow's father used to say that, if it pleased God to take from him any of his children, he hoped it might be Isaac, as the least promising. Clavius, the great mathematician of his age, was so stupid in his boyhood, that his teachers could make nothing of him till they tried him in geometry. Carraci, the celebrated painter, was so inapt in his youth, that his masters advised him to restrict his ambition to the grinding of colors.

"One of the most popular authoresses of the present day," says an English writer, "could not read when she was seven. Her mother was rather uncomfortable about it, but said, as every body did learn, with opportunity, she supposed her child would do so at last. By eighteen, the apparently slow genius paid the heavy but inevitable debts of her father from the profits of her first work, and before thirty, had published thirty volumes." Dr. Scott, the commentator, could not compose a theme when twelve years old; and even at a later age, Dr. Adam Clark, after incredible effort, failed to commit to memory a poem of a few stanzas only. At nine years of age, one who afterwards became a Chief Justice in this country, was, during a whole winter, unable to commit to memory the little poem found in one of our school books.

When Dr. Watts came to his death-bed, he said, "I bless God I can lie down with comfort at night, unsolicitous whether I wake in this world or another."

"YES, AS A CHILD."

"Not as a child shall we again behold her."

O say not so! how shall I know my darling,
If changed her form, and veil'd with shining hair?
If, since her flight, has grown my little starling,
How shall I know her there?
On memory's page, by viewless fingers painted,
I see the features of my angel-child;
She passed away, ere sin her soul had tainted,—
Passed to the undefiled.

O say not so, for I would clasp her, even
As when below she lay upon my breast;
And dream of her as my fair bud in heaven,
Amid the blossoms blest.
My little one was like a folded lily,
Sweeter than any on the azure wave;
But night came down, a starless night, and chilly;
Alas! we could not save!

Yes, as a child, serene and noble poet,
(O heaven were dark, were children wanting there!)
I hope to clasp my bud as when I wore it;
A dimpled baby fair.
Though years have flown, toward my blue-eyed daughter,
My heart yearns oft'times with a mother's love;
Its never dying tendrils now enfold her,—
Enfold my child above.

E'en as a babe, my little blue-eyed daughter,
Nestle and coo upon my heart again;
Wait for thy mother by the river water—
It shall not be in vain!
Wait as a child.—how shall I know my darling,
If changed her form, and veil'd with shining hair?
If, since her flight, has grown my little starling,
How shall I know her there?

SIAMESE VIRTUE.

A correspondent of the Oberlin Evangelist communicates the following, which we suppose is a fair sample of the height to which heathenism can elevate its devotees.

The Siamese are all professed merit-makers. They are continually by various acts endeavoring to add to their supposed present stock. The first lesson the Siamese mother teaches her child is, that merit-making is the great business of life, and that it may be made by feeding a priest, a dog, or a crow, or in some similar way. Siamese mothers appear to be very particular to instruct their children in the work of feeding priests. And often have I seen them, before their little ones were able to walk, force them to wi and make their little contributions. They tell their children if they do thus they will get much merit and be happy.

The individual who travels in Siam will often see a little shelf fastened up on a tree or post in front of the Siamese houses. If he were to ask the dwellers there, what these shelves are for, the answer would be, "to feed crows upon." And when he asks, why do you feed the crows, the answer comes, "Why, to get merit to be sure." So when an individual has thrown out some fish or rice to the wolfish dogs which throng this land, he feels an inward satisfaction, for he flatters himself that by this act he has added to his stock of merit. Missionary physicians are accustomed to treat the natives who are sick, and who desire their help, without charge. The natives in turn seem almost to envy our situation, for they often say to us that we are getting, merit to ourselves in great measure. And instead of feeling much obligation to us for the services we may have rendered them, they will congratulate us because we have the means of making merit so fast.

The Budhist religion teaches that it is a sin to destroy animal life, and that whoever is the means of saving or prolonging it, has done a meritorious act. A few months ago I caught a serpent of the most poisonous kind near my back door. The natives say that its bite will produce death in thirty minutes. My old teacher urged me to set this serpent at liberty, as I had now a great chance to get merit. The Siamese hold that the only acts which produce merit to any great amount, are those that are not in view of any selfish reason. The man who feeds his elephant because he carries burdens for him, or his buffalo because he ploughs his ground, or his dog because he watches his house, gets no merit, because he does it selfishly. But if he feeds an elephant, or buffalo, or dog, or a crow, from which he can expect no favor in return, then his act becomes meritorious to a great degree. To set at liberty a serpent whose bite is not poisonous, is of little account; but to set at liberty one that is evil and deadly to mankind, this is pure merit.

The rich and powerful make merit by building wats, feeding priests on a large scale, and by making great burnings for the illustrious dead. One of the highest and most wealthy officers of government has lately fenced off a portion of the river, within which any fish may not be caught, but may live and enjoy their lives to their full natural length. This he does to make merit on a large scale. By a thousand means the people of this land are daily trying to add to their present stock of merit. They say that such labors naturally produce happiness, and that while they do not atone for past sins, yet they will modify greatly one's future punishment, and that to those who have not sinned at all, they will procure for them fortunate circumstances in this life, and glory hereafter.

A person perhaps would be excused, if he should draw the conclusion from facts like the above, that the Siamese are a quiet and honest people. But the opposite of this is true. They are as a people extremely regardless of the law of right. It is doubtful whether any of these Eastern nations surpass them in this. The delineation the Apostle Paul gives of heathen character, in his Epistle to the Romans, applies to this people in almost every particular. They are not bold and daring in their wicked deeds, as the Malays are said to be, but are sly and mean. To lie is a most common act among them, and so common that no one blushes when he is detected in a lie.

I was urging my teacher to go with me on a short itinerating tour, when he said, "I cannot go, for I have no one to see to my household stuff while I shall be gone." I replied, "You can put your money and your choice goods in some one of your neighbor's houses while you may be absent." "Ah," said he, "Teacher, you do not yet know the Siamese. If I should do that I should lose all my stuff." "But," said I to him, "have you no neighbor in whom you may confide? You have lived at your ban many years, and cannot you trust any one?" "No. They all will cheat and steal when they have an opportunity and it meets their profit."

Loaded boats often upset in the river and canals, and while the articles with which they were freighted are floating off upon the tide, persons in their boats will rush to them from all sides, not to help the unfortunate sufferer right his boat and regain his property, but each to seize and carry off whatever can be laid hold of.

The Siamese are a good illustration of the fact that a religion that recognizes no ever-living, omnipresent God, and no Saviour, does not reach and purify the heart, and fails to restrain its subjects from the habitual practice of the grossest vices. The religious books of the Siamese contain a long list of good moral maxims. The people praise these truths, but none follow them. They say, "Who does right, and who can do right? All persons are best pleased with the present state of things, and love to follow the heart of the body; and who can oppose this heart and follow justice?" While they hold that good and evil are rewarded by the natural course of events, they do many self-sacrificing acts for the sake, they say, of escaping evil in the next state of existence; yet all these acts are very superficial, and appear only upon the surface; while the full fountains of the heart send forth continually deadly streams from every side.

Tell me not that man has within him a native principle that is capable of itself to purify and redeem him. But tell me of a Saviour who has power on earth to forgive sins, and who establishes in the hearts of his children a new principle of life, and preserves them by his own power through faith unto salvation. Speak to me of such an one, for He is the foundation of all our goodness, and the end of all our hopes. L. B. L.

THE INFLUENCE OF ONE WOMAN.

The Home Mission Record contains an illustration of the influence of one pious woman, which should stimulate others to use all their influence, leaving it for God to bless and prosper the labors performed. Before a Baptist Church existed in New Hampshire, a pious and excellent lady by the name of Scammon lived in the vicinity of Newtown, in that State. She was conscientiously and scripturally a Baptist, and fearlessly advocated her views as she had opportunity. Deep-seated and embittered prejudices, however, so generally existed against the Baptists in those times, that for forty years it was not known that more than one individual was won, by her influence, to embrace the truth. Yet her faith did not fail. She often expressed the belief that her prayers would be heard, and that the sentiments which she advocated would ultimately be embraced by that community.

At length, an old work—"Norcott on Baptism"—was thrown in her way. She read it with intense interest. The subject appeared to her so important, and the arguments so clear and convincing, that she determined to reprint the work at her own expense. She made a journey to Boston for that purpose. On making known to a printer the object of her visit, he informed her that he had one hundred copies of the work on hand. She joyfully purchased the whole, carried them home, and put them in circulation. They were extensively read, and many were led by them to embrace the truth. Among the number was Dr. Samuel Shepherd, whose subsequent labors and success in the ministry were very remarkable.

About the time of Mrs. Scammon's death, an extended revival was experienced in that region, from the fruits of which the First Baptist Church in New Hampshire was constituted in Newtown, in 1755. In the course of a few years three other churches were gathered in that vicinity.

In the history of Mrs. Scammon, we have a noble example of Christian fidelity, of consistent and persevering adherence to the truth in the midst of opposing influences, and of the ultimate success and triumph of that truth. And we would say to all our brethren and sisters who are emigrating to our new settlements, 'Go and do likewise.' Be consistent—cultivate deep personal piety—maintain the truth as it is in Christ, and expect success. And, as a means of doing good, scatter with liberal hand good books wherever light is needed.

LITERARY RELICS.

The house in which Milton resided between the years 1651 and 1659, existed only a few years back, at No. 18 York-street, Westminster, London. Jeremy Bentham, to whom the house lately belonged, put up a tablet on the back wall, (believed to have been the front in the poet's time,) inscribed, "Sacred to Milton, prince of poets." This habitation, wherein part of "Paradise Lost" was undoubtedly composed, was, at the time we allude to, rented to two or three poor families, the ground floor being converted into a chandler's shop. From the parlor windows, the poet could have commanded a view of St. James' Park, more picturesque then than at present. At Chalfont, in Buckinghamshire, is another residence of Milton's, in which he commenced "Paradise Regained." Though the pear-tree, said to be planted by Cromwell, in Sydney College, Cambridge, was cut down in March, 1833, the mulberry-tree, planted by his illustrious Latin secretary, Milton, has been more fortunate, still flourishing in the pleasant garden of Christ's College, where it was planted by the youthful student. Some years ago it suffered considerably from a violent gale of wind, which sadly shattered it; but its aged boughs were carefully propped up, and its trunk protected by a partial covering of lead. With these aids it promised to look green for many years to come. Its fertility appeared to have undergone no change; in the summer it was laden with fruit, of which more than two bushels of the finest flavor were gathered in the season of 1835. The smallest fragments from this tree were religiously cherished by the poet's numerous admirers. In August, 1790, when Milton's coffin was discovered buried under the desk in the chancel of the Church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, some friends of the overseer contrived, at night time, to possess themselves of the hair and some of the teeth of the immortal poet.

In the grounds of Abbington Abbey, Northamptonshire, stands Garrick's mulberry-tree, with this inscription upon copper attached to one of its limbs:—"This tree was planted by David Garrick, Esq., at the request of Ann Thursby, as a growing testimony of their friendship. 1778."

Henry Kirke White's favorite tree, whereon he had cut "H. K. W., 1805," stood on the sands at Whitton, Northumberland, till it was cut down by the woodman's axe; but, in veneration for the poet's memory, the portion bearing his initials was carefully preserved in an elegant gilt frame.

Some years ago, a curious arm-chair, which had belonged to Gay, the poet, was sold at public auction, at Barnstaple, his native place. It contained a drawer under the seat, at the extremity of which was a smaller drawer, connected with a rod in front, by which it was drawn out.

Benjamin Franklin's "fine crab-tree walking-stick, with a gold head, curiously wrought in the form of a cap of liberty," we all know was bequeathed, in a codicil to his will, "to the friend of mankind, General Washington;" adding, "that if it had been a sceptre, he has merited it, and would become it." General Washington has a name beyond the price of sceptres.

Pope's house, at Binfield, has been pulled down, but the poet's parlor still exists, as part of the present mansion, erected on that spot. A patch of the great forest near Binfield has been honorably preserved, under the name of Pope's Wood. His house at Twidenham is gone, the garden is bare, but a celebrated grotto remains, stripped, however, of all that gave it picturesqueness, grace, and beauty.

Cooper's house, at Olney, is still standing, in the same ruinous state so humorously described by the poet; his parlor is occupied as a girl's school. The summer-house in the garden, in which he used to sit conning his verses, also remains, its walls covered with visitor's names. His residence in the neighboring village of Weston has been much altered, but is still beautiful, with a profusion of roses in it.

THE STOLEN HIDES.

William Savery, an eminent preacher among the Quakers, was a tanner by trade, and known by all as "one who walked humbly with his God." One night a quantity of hides was stolen from his tannery, and he had reason to believe that the thief was a quarrelsome, drunken neighbor, whom I shall call John Smith. The next week the following advertisement appeared in the county newspaper:—

"Whoever stole a quantity of hides on the fifth of the present month, is hereby informed that the owner has a sincere wish to be his friend. If poverty tempted him to this false step, the owner will keep the whole transaction secret, and will gladly put him in the way of obtaining money by means more likely to bring him peace of mind."

This singular advertisement attracted considerable attention; but the culprit alone knew who had the kind offer. When he read it, his heart melted within him, and he was filled with sorrow for what he had done. A few nights afterwards, as the tanner's family were about retiring to rest, they heard a timid knock; and when the door was opened, there stood John Smith, with a load of hides on his shoulder. Without looking up, he said, "I have brought these back, Mr. Savery; where shall I put them?" "Wait till I can get a lantern, and I will go to the barn with thee," he replied; "then perhaps thou wilt come in, and tell me how this happened. We will see what can be done for thee."

As soon as they were gone out, his wife prepared some hot coffee, and placed pies and meat on the table. When they returned from the barn, she said, "Neighbor Smith, I thought some hot supper would be good for thee." He turned his back toward her, and did not speak. After leaning against the fireplace in silence a few moments, he said, in a choked voice, "It is the first time I ever stole any thing, and I have felt very bad about it. I am sure I didn't once think that I should ever come to what I am. But I took to drinking, and then to quarreling. Since I began to go down hill, every body gives me a kick. You are the first man that has ever offered me a helping hand. My wife is sickly, and my children are starving. You have sent them many a meal; God bless you; and yet I stole the hides. But I tell you the truth, when I say it is the first time I was ever a thief."

"Let it be the last, my friend," replied William Savery. "The secret still remains between ourselves. Thou art still young, and it is in thy power to make up for lost time. Promise me that thou wilt not drink any intoxicating liquor for a year, and I will employ thee to-morrow, on good wages. The little boy can pick up stones. But eat a bit now, and drink some hot coffee. Perhaps it will keep thee from craving any thing stronger to-night. Doubtless thou wilt find it hard to abstain at first; but keep up a brave heart, for the sake of thy wife and children, and it will soon become easy. When thou hast need of coffee, tell Mary, and she will always give it thee."

The poor fellow tried to eat and drink, but the food seemed to choke him. After vainly trying to compose his feelings, he bowed his head on the table, and wept like a child. After a while he ate and drank, and his host parted with him for the night, with the friendly words, "Try to do well, John, and thou wilt always find a friend in me." He entered into his employ the next day, and remained with him many years, a sober, honest, and faithful man. The secret of the theft was kept between them; but after John's death, William Savery sometimes told the story, to prove that evil might be overcome with good.

Mystery is often mistaken for wisdom, pedantry for knowledge, and prejudice for conviction.

THE DUTY OF EVERY CHRISTIAN TO PREACH THE GOSPEL—CONCLUDED.

The remarks we have made on this subject have been suggested by the perusal of President Wayland's discourse upon the Apostolic Ministry—a most valuable production, which we wish could be placed in the hands of all Christians. The views therein developed, are in substantial agreement with those we have always entertained; particularly, those which regard the Great Commission as laying under obligation the whole church. Preaching—proclaiming—heralding, or announcing—the good news of salvation through a risen Saviour, is the duty of every Christian, and that because he is a Christian. As President W. justly remarks, "it enters into the elementary idea of discipleship. With this every other subsequent idea must be in harmony. No ecclesiastical system which we can form can either liberate a disciple from this obligation, or take away his privilege of thus laboring for Christ. Whatever offices are created in the church, are created for the purpose of enabling the disciple the better to discharge this duty. They are made for the church, the church is not made for them; and it becomes us ever to be watchful, lest by any error the church of Christ be deprived of this, the mainspring of all its efficiency."

Much has been said, of late years, upon the inefficiency of the present ministration of the gospel to bring about the state of things usually denominated the Millennium. The limited progress which the gospel has thus far made, and its apparent inadequacy to the extermination of evils which exist, notwithstanding the continued discussion of Christianity in the pulpit, are referred to in proof of the position. It is even argued, that the preaching of the gospel was not designed to be the means of salvation to the nations of the earth at large, but only to take out of them a people for the Lord—a small, select band—leaving the vast multitude to perish in some dreadful overthrow, after which the Millennium shall be introduced as a New Dispensation.

To what extent the Millennium will be a new dispensation, we will not pretend to say, not having much light on this point. Moreover, we will not dispute, that the judgments of the Lord will be sent upon the nations previous to that glorious period, and that many sinners will be consumed out of the earth. The judgments of the Lord have been common in every age; they are not reserved particularly for the period immediately preceding the Millennium. But that the gospel, as it was originally given to men by Jesus Christ, and preached in the way he required, is inadequate to the conversion of the world, we are not yet prepared to admit. We believe, that nothing is wanting but a general waking up, on the part of Christians, to fulfill their covenant obligations. Let them all do that which "enters into the elementary idea of discipleship"—let them no longer confine the work of proclaiming Christ to the ministry—let men and women all go about it, hastening to tell sinners of the risen Saviour, and feeling that they have no right to call themselves Christians while they neglect to do so—and then, if the millennial day is not rapidly brought forward, we will admit that the gospel is inadequate to the work. But to say that the gospel can never effect the world's conversion, while its power has not been fairly tested, is, to say the least, a very unfair mode of reasoning. Nay, it throws discredit upon the word of God, for that sets it forth as the chosen instrumentality for this purpose. See John 12: 32. Rom. 1: 16. 1 Cor. 1: 18, &c.

It is in the unwillingness of Christians to discharge this duty, that we find a fearful significance in those words of the Saviour—"Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this sinful and adulterous generation, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." Mark 8; 38. There is no particular tendency in unrenewed men to be ashamed of outward conformity to the Moral Law. They usually glory in it. The Pharisee, who said, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers," &c., gloried in his fancied righteousness; nor did his neighbors hold him in any the less esteem for it, but rather honored him the more. Even among the heathen, those who attain some conformity to the law are had in esteem, even by their profligate neighbors. But to confess that he is inwardly so corrupt that he needs Christ—to confess that, notwithstanding his external righteousness, his heart so revolts from the holiness of the law that he deserves the deepest hell—to confess that it is only by Christ that he stands justified before God, and that it is only by the grace and power of Christ working in him that he delights in the law of the Lord—a confession which, for the truth's sake, he is bound to make—is something which the unrenewed man is ashamed to do. It exposes him to derision.

In preachieg the gospel, however, this confession is continually made. It is implied in the message which the gospel brings. The proclamation of Christ as a Saviour, is the proclamation of man's guilt. And if Christians would but do it daily, and habitually, as a part of their business, they would not only declare the guilt of those to whom they make the proclamation, but would also be all the time confessing their own. And what less than this is implied in confessing Christ before men? Is not this just what is meant, when it is said, "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father who is in heaven?" Also in the words, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, thou shalt be saved?" It is true, we sometimes hear sinners exhorted to confess Christ, as if the duty might be performed by merely submitting to baptism. But the truth is, confessing Christ is a daily duty, of which submission to baptism is but the beginning. It is a duty which extends through a Christian's life; and we believe, that an earnest waking up on the part of the Church to proclaim Christ crucified to the world, would be making that confession of his name, which stands opposed to being ashamed of him and of his words.

AGRICULTURE IN PALESTINE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following slip from the office of the "Presbyterian," Philadelphia, is from the pen of Dr. Engles, who has given much attention to the subject of Christian effort in Palestine. This, with the accompanying letter from Mrs. Minor, will doubtless be read with interest by all, independent of the bearing they may have upon our own enterprise in that land.

Cultivation of Palestine.

The small band of enterprising Americans who first conceived the project of practically benefiting the dwellers about Jerusalem, by instructing them in the arts of agriculture, and relieving their more pressing personal wants, have, as our readers are aware, deeply enlisted our sympathies. We have known no modern mission more adventurous, as it was undertaken without pecuniary aid, and with no pledges of assistance from those who could command the means. When first brought under our notice, it was in its incipiency, and while to some it appeared visionary, we thought it exhibited no ordinary faith in the merciful and sufficient promises of a God who overrules all, and brings to pass events of least likelihood. We were well aware that those personally engaged in executing it held certain peculiarities of faith with which we could not sympathize, and yet we could not but honor their piety. They were intent upon accomplishing a benevolent work, and thus far we could not withhold our co-operation. Their object, as candidly acknowledged, was rather preliminary to Christian missions in the usual acceptation of the term. It was to elevate the Jews, resident in Jerusalem, from their present abject and dependent condition, and thus to render them more accessible to religious instruction. How they proposed to effect this design, we will attempt to explain.

It is well known from the Bible history of Judea, that it was once a land pre-eminent in fruitfulness. It was productive in the vine and olive, in corn and wine. All signs of this fertility, for many centuries, disappeared, in accordance with the curse pronounced by the Almighty; Jerusalem was laid on heaps; the walled cities and prosperous villages were razed to the ground, and the fertile fields were desolate and covered with useless weeds. No modern traveler fails to notice the general aspect of desolation which marks this once favored land, and to contrast its present with its past characteristics. Wherever the eye wanders, the evidences of fulfilled prophecy arrest the attention. Strangers to the true faith possess the land, and yet without the desire or ability to make it worth possessing. The Jews who still dwell there, are so far from being the owners of their father-land, that they are the victims of a poverty the most abject, broken in spirit, without enterprise, without ability to restore their land, and perpetually held in check, in body and mind, by those who have entered into the inheritance of their fathers. Their scanty subsistence is derived from their countrymen in other lands; and as paupers dependent on this kind of charity, they dare not listen to the instruction of Christians, without forfeiting their small annual allowance. Under these circumstances, it would seem hopeless to send them religious teachers, unless they are at the same time prepared to relieve them from this state of absolute dependence. Otherwise starvation would be their doom as soon as they openly inquired into the truth of the gospel. They are not prepared to become martyrs. They are profoundly ignorant of the true character of the gospel, and all they know about Christianity is from what they see in the miserable superstitions of the Greek and Latin Churches, which hold out to them no inducements to forsake their present faith. They would rather be poor and despised Jews, than Christians of this type; and who will blame them for this? The question, then, arises, how can they be released from their present state of dependence on the Jewish fund, to enable them to investigate the claims of Christianity? The best answer, in our opinion, which has thus far been suggested to the query, is that which our American agricultural company in Palestine is attempting to give. Improve their temporal condition; give them the means of self-reliance; show them the way of procuring a subsistence for themselves by their own labor, and you not only make them grateful, but place them in circumstances in which they can independently inquire whether Jesus is the Messiah promised to their fathers.

Thus far the experiment, made under the most disadvantageous circumstances, has promised well. The letters we have published from Jerusalem, may be relied on, and in them, as our readers must have seen, no small progress has been made in awakening the latent spirit of enterprise in the Jews, and in conciliating them to the Americans, who have pitied them in their time of need. The small band of American colonists, depending on casual aid, without any influential society at home to send them supplies, have made a beginning on a small scale. They have cultivated the ground, they have tested its amazing fertility, they have found no difficulty in obtaining Jewish and Arab laborers, they have ministered to the bodily wants of many, they have successfully dispensed medicines to the sick, they have awakened the interest and won the hearts of many around them; in short, they have demonstrated the feasibility of their experiment, and all that is now wanting is efficient and systematic effort, on the plan adopted by them, to return to the Holy Land some of the many blessings which we have derived from it. God still loves Jerusalem, the Jews are still his people, although for a season cut off from his favor, and we cannot doubt that he will favor those who will zealously and resolutely endeavor to restore Judea to its pristine glory. In attempting to excite attention to this practical and practicable experiment, we would summarily state, that the first quality of lands in Palestine may be purchased at an extremely low rate; that with proper culture they may be made as fruitful as they ever were; that the Jews are prepared to forego their prejudices, inspired by their false teachers, and to engage in agricultural pursuits, had they the means; that the Arab tribes are even more friendly to the enterprise, and will not only contribute their labor, but will most willingly give their children for instruction; that the present government will oppose no obstacles, but rather further the plan, and no serious difficulty is anticipated from this quarter for the future. These are certainly encouraging facts. They open a prospect for the amelioration of Jews and Arabs, which should not be disregarded. What seems to be needed is some plan of co-operation among Christians in this country, and it might be of different evangelical denominations, for the case is one in which their respective peculiarities need not clash, for furnishing the right kind of laborers and the necessary funds. We do not, in the first instance, propose the sending forth of preachers of the gospel, but pioneer laborers to till the soil and introduce the best methods of agriculture, in the full expectation that their example would prove stimulating to the degraded inhabitants of that once favored land. Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, and Baptists, might unite in this work, and as they should find opportunity, they might associate schools with their farms, and at a more matured period of their labors, they could form Church organizations with a prospect of success. Both Jews and Arabs, as the experiment has shown, can fully appreciate the advantages to their temporal condition which the plan proposes, although not now prepared to entertain the missionaries of the cross; the latter, however, would in all probability be the consequence and result of the former. Their minds would be conciliated to the friends who had taken such active measures to relieve their social degradation and oppression. Should a society on this general and liberal basis be established, we should augur well of its success. Who will take the initiative? A few active and persevering spirits in these various denominations might give an impulse to the plan, and if it should be first fixed that this was to be primarily an agricultural enterprise, they might act harmoniously and without collision. We suggest that something should be done speedily, for the field is now wide open.

Letter of Mrs. Minor.

Plains of Sharon, Nov. 20th, 1853.

Mr. Thomas B. Stillman—

Dear Brother in Christ:—In compliance with your kind request, to give you some account of our progress, I am happy to state, that notwithstanding our work is continued on a small scale, yet, according to the means employed, our success in this place has been truly encouraging. In the first place, a friendly acquaintance is commenced with the Jews in Jaffa, and a kind influence exerted towards them. They say, that many come to aid the Jews in Jerusalem, but that none hitherto have come to the help of those in Jaffa, and that they now hope that American Christians will do something for them. An aged father among them, one day at our house, spoke to us with great feeling of their poverty, ignorance, and degradation, and exclaimed, "And we have no hope now but in Allah [God] and you Americans." Many have come to us, begging for employment, half covered and hungry; and our hearts are constantly pained that our ability to aid them is so limited. We have, however, done what we could. Besides distributing the garments and cotton goods sent by friends at home, we have divided our own with them. Many have received articles of clothing from the boxes sent by Mrs. S. and your friends; also a few yards each of domestic goods, (suitable for their loose garments,) which were sent by Presbyterian friends of Philadelphia. The sick have received medicine, which in some cases has been a great blessing. To a few cases of the greatest distress, we have given a little money, while they are always welcomed to share our brown loaf. We have had as many as fifteen sleep in our house at a time, most of them visitors. Their first men visit us and express themselves much pleased with our effort, and offer us any number of laborers to learn agriculture when we are ready to receive them, and often inquire if we have heard recently from the United States, and if the friends of Israel there will soon help us to enlarge our work.

We could obtain any desirable quantity of good land near us, by lease or purchase, but we have no means to embrace the frequent favorable offers from our Arab neighbors, who are often in great need of money, and beg us to take their land and settle permanently with them. This year we have only leased a few acres, as all that we have planted through the summer demanded the particular care of garden beds, watered by little channels beside each bed, from the reservoir of the well, twice a week. This irrigation generally continues from the middle of May till near the close of October. As we have no frost in this neighborhood, the fall, winter, and spring season, is the best for cultivation. Our third crop of corn, since June, is now nearly ready for the table, and two crops of beans; but potatoes, beets, tomatoes, and eggplants, have only borne one crop. About the 1st of October we commenced planting our winter seeds in preparation for the rains, and they all look very flourishing now. Beans and peas set full; beets, cabbage, turnips, radishes, lettuce, carrots, cucumbers and squashes all well started; cucumbers and squashes in blossom, and cabbages beginning to head.

The weather is very fine, with occasional showers. Our first heavy rain fell the 31st inst., and the thermometer has ranged thus far this month, from 73 to 66 at noon, in the shade; from 70 to 61 in the morning, and from 72 to 64 at night—somewhat different, I suppose, from what it is with you in New York.

We have had quite an interest excited among our neighbors, this week, by the first exhibition by Bro. J. G. of ploughing with our American plough. It is one of R. L. Allen's, of New York, that we have recently purchased from Mr. Smith, U. S. Consul, Beirot, (as Meshullam retains those we obtained of Mr. Allen before we left home.) It is number 10½, I believe his smallest size, and turns this light soil easily with one mule, and is much praised, and superior, probably, to any thing seen here before since Elisha's time. We are sowing half an acre of horse beans, which are highly esteemed by the Jews and Arabs; also a sample of American buckwheat and oats, and one measure of Jordan wheat, the best in this land. The wheat here is different from ours; it is very hard, and in consistency like Indian corn. It is very difficult to thresh or grind find, and will not make soft flour. The straw must be trodden with cattle until it is broken very fine—one-fourth pulverized, to separate the grain. We should be greatly indebted to our friends if they would send us a bushel of the "beardless spring wheat" for seed before March.

It would give us great pleasure if dear Mrs. S. and yourself could see our little plantation as it is now. About one-third is planted with orange and pomegranate trees half grown; two hundred of the former are now heavily laden with their golden fruit; and the mixed variety of plants of other lands growing between their rows, present an interesting and beautiful scene. The garden is on an elevation, from which the white stone houses of Jaffa, surrounded with the eternal verdure of palms and orange groves, and blue waters of the sea, are in lovely prospect.

The health of the family has been generally very good, with one exception of ague in one of our sisters, about the close of last month. As for myself, constant exercise in the open air of this delicious climate, very early rising, and our humble diet, has cured me of the most inveterate dispepsia, with which I have been afflicted for many years, and I have not enjoyed before such perfect and uninterrupted health and vigor since my early youth. For this inestimable blessing, I render my humble thanks to our Father in Heaven.

We greatly rejoice that the "American Society for Ameliorating the Condition of the Jews" will send an intelligent farmer to this land, with the purpose, I trust, of encouraging agriculture among the Jews; also that a missionary (a working man, I believe,) is on his way, sent by yourself and friends to the help of this long desolate but chosen vineyard of the Lord. The field is wide, the opportunities great, the harvest white, but the laborers are few indeed. May the Lord of the harvest hasten the coming of many warm hearts and strong hands to this needy, and most sacred of all the fields of labor on the missionary chart of a world. O that professed lovers of Israel, lovers of our blessed Lord, at home, realized the importance of this work for Israel, and would send out good men and true—practical, humble, servants of Christ—and would send them well sustained with a free-will offering, worthy of the work, and becoming the service of Him who hath chosen to place His name and His covenant people here.

I am happy to state that the Chief Rabbi of Jaffa is so friendly and liberal that he has rented a room in his house for a school, where Sister Williams is industriously engaged with about fifteen Jewish girls five days each week beside teaching other occasional Christian and Arab scholars. The deep interest she feels in her work, and her long experience and success as a teacher, peculiarly qualify her for this difficult and arduous labor.

If my time permitted, I could give you many singular recitals and incidents of our daily life in this interesting land, but I find that constant care, and the ceaseless calls of rural life and labor, have almost entirely unfitted my pen for its former use. Last month our chief Rabbi, (Mr. Levi,) gave his daughter Rachel, thirteen years of age, in marriage to the son of one of the first Jewish families in Jerusalem; he was eighteen years of age, and had never seen Rachel! Great expense and preparations were necessary to fit out all the family of the Rabbi to return with the escort sent by the father of the bridegroom, to bring the bride to Jerusalem. Mr. Levi came beforehand and advised us of the nuptials, and invited us to accompany the family procession to the wedding in the Holy City, at his own expense. We understood that he regarded this as the greatest mark of his friendship that he could bestow, and returned sincere acknowledgments, and our kindest wishes for the prosperity of his child, pleading our daily care and close engagements as preventing our accompanying him. On his return in about two weeks (it being customary for the bride's parents to remain with her a longer time,) he called again, and related to us with much feeling and pleasure the flattering reception they received, and the happy prospects of his daughter's settlement. I would here state, that he owns and cultivates a flourishing bianah about half an hour distant from ours, and he is, I believe, the first Jew who commenced cultivation in this vicinity.

Since we commenced our work here, we have been obliged, for want of means, to refuse many affecting cases of suffering Jews, begging for employment at the lowest wages, merely sufficient for coarse bread and covering. But last week an interesting young man about nineteen years of age, from Jerusalem, came to us while at work in the garden. He had known us in Artas, having labored there with us a short time. We sat down on the ground and listened to his misery. He plead his abject want, and entreated to remain with us on any terms, and stated that he could obtain no employment, and has no resource, and has a mother and wife to support. His white cotton skirt and blue vest were worn to strings, and he had not a rag beside. His pale face beamed with hope when he added, that we knew how willing he was to work before, and he was sure that we would not send him away. This was true, for we knew him to be unusually active and humble, and of a good character among the Jews in Jerusalem. What could we do? Our little fund was almost exhausted for our daily bread, and friends and aid so distant and uncertain. After prayer and consultation, we determined to divide with him, and take him into our house. We give him 3½ piastres per day, six days in the week, and a clean bed, from which he boards himself, and says he shall contrive to save more than half to send to his wife and mother. He is very grateful, works diligently, and begs that we will never send him away. I mention the case of Solomon (though only one of many,) so that if any friend of Israel should desire his constant employment, they may have the opportunity of aiding him, and we shall be most happy to faithfully apply their charity.

There are many rumors about the war with Russia, and the Turkish soldiers belonging to Jerusalem and Jaffa have been called to Constantinople; but nothing is yet certain. The natives are full of apprehensions, and inquire if we think they must all be killed. It is commonly reported among them, that a Greek Prophet prophesied, when the Turks first took Constantinople, that at the end of 400 years their Government would be destroyed, which, according to their records, runs out this year. We also hear, that the Jews in Jerusalem anticipate a better state of things in the event of Russia taking possession of this land. Meanwhile we pursue our humble work with a quiet trust in Him, knowing assuredly, that no evil can prevail against us without his knowledge and permission.

Ah, me! as I penned this last word, a poor Jew came to the door in the most desperate want. He says he came from Jerusalem—that "the English Consul," to whom he applied for aid, sent him to us. His face is the picture of despair, and he begs for work of any kind for the least return, but it is not in our power to receive him. It is sorrow indeed, to be a witness to the sufferings of Israel in this their own land, and be able to do so little for their relief. We entreat your continued prayers and remembrance.

Yours gratefully, C. S. Minor.

HORATIO G. JONES, D.D.

[This distinguished servant of the Lord has been gathered to his fathers, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. Elder Jones resided at Roxborough, Philadelphia County, Pa., nearly fifty years, and was an active and prominent minister, in his denomination, all that period. At one time, 1801 to 1805, he was settled as pastor of the church at Salem, N. J., and while in that position supplied the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Shiloh, on the Sabbath, for many months, and always entertained a kindly feeling towards our people. From the accounts which have appeared in the Baptist papers, he was universally esteemed and beloved; and as the Christian life of an individual, when it becomes prominent by good actions, and claims the admiration of his fellow pilgrims, does not belong exclusively to any one branch of Zion, we avail ourselves of the opportunity to commend the mission of one who proved himself so acceptable as a minister and a citizen, and cut from the Christian Chronicle the following notices, which will exhibit, in some feeble measure, the high estimate in which he was held by his church, his friends, and the community at large. Our readers will recognize, in the third article, the pen of one of our correspondents, with whose effusions they have been familiar for years past.]

Funeral of Rev. Horatio G. Jones, D.D.

The readers of the Christian Chronicle have already been apprised of the decease of this valuable Christian minister, which occurred at about one o'clock on the morning of the 12th December, at the good old age of seventy-seven, with the exception of two months.

On the 14th December, hundreds might have been seen, in conveyances of various kinds, wending their way to "the house of mourning," where a scene was presented, which Roxborough has seldom, if ever, before witnessed. Arrived at the house, for scores of years the abode of piety and hospitality, we were ushered into the parlor, where lay the mortal remains of "the preacher once—the witness now." His every feature was perfect; his brow was calm, and he seemed sweetly sleeping after fatigue and labor. He was arrayed in his full preaching dress—the garments he wore on his last visit to his beloved Merion, on the 6th of November, to preach his last sermon, and to surround for the last time on earth the table of the Lord. Tears were shed, but they were those of joy as well as grief, for we almost realized the happiness on which he had entered, and anticipated the blessedness of our next meeting.

The period arrived when he must leave his house, and be "carried by devout men to his burial." Prayer, solemn and earnest, was offered by his oldest ministerial friend, the Rev. Joseph Walker, of Brandywine. Some 30 ministers, including Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Dutch Reformed, and Methodists, as well as those of his own denomination, took the lead in the solemn, slow, silent procession; the body borne by the deacons and members of the church, the Rev. J. Walker, and Drs. Shadrach, Belcher and Gardner acting as pall-bearers; the mourning family followed, and after them the whole body of the members of the church. The entire scene was deeply impressive.

Arrived at the meeting-house of Roxborough, where the deceased had resided nearly fifty years, and where his family vault has long ago contained the bodies of members of his family, whose happy spirits he has now rejoined in the realms of life, the Rev. T. Winter read the hymn of the venerable and still surviving Montgomery—

> "Servant of God, well done;
> Rest from thy loved employ;
> The battle fought, the victory won,
> Enter thy Master's joy," &c.

The usual devotional services having occupied the attention of the full congregation, the Rev. A. D. Gillette, of New York, by the appointment of his deceased friend several years ago, delivered a sermon, full of evangelical truth and of tender pathos, from Psalms xxiii. 4, "Though I walk," &c., which he closed with a full and interesting sketch of his life; and the Rev. J. H. Kennard addressed the church. The body was then borne to the grave in solemn silence, and brief but appropriate addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Shadrach and the Rev. T. Winter, who closed the solemnity with prayer.

Services at Lower Merion.

On Lord's Day morning last, by arrangement of the church at Lower Merion,* a funeral service was conducted in their own house. A large and deeply affected congregation was present, though the season was very inclement. Dr. Belcher led in the introductory services, and the Rev. Thomas Winter, of Roxborough, a personal friend of the deceased for more then thirty-four years, discoursed on the death of Stephen, as illustrative of the Christian's refuge and hope, making an exceedingly appropriate application to the service in which they were engaged.

A memoir of Dr. Jones may hereafter be expected.

Tribute to the memory of H. G. Jones, D.D.

Mr. Editor:—Among the hundreds who have been afflicted in the loss of a strong and beautiful pillar in Zion, the valiant and devoted Horatio G. Jones, permit one who knew his worth and shared his kindness many years, to add a line or two to what has already been testified in your columns of his office-work, as a testimonial to his deserts as a Christian and a citizen, which duty and gratitude will not suffer me to repress; that when a proper biographer may attempt to embody the virtues and services of him whom we honor in death, no thread of his goodness may be missed, but that his whole character may be portrayed in the true glowing colors he reflected during his pilgrimage on earth, and that more especially those traits best known among those who knew him best—his own special charge, and in the social circle of his own particular friends.

As a "father" in the church, abundant materials will readily be found of his ministerial character abroad, and especially as a leader in the doings of the time-honored Philadelphia Baptist Association, through a long period of its operations. He however did not confine his mission to the single duty of preaching the gospel, but embraced in it all the duties of a man and a republican, to sanctify the civil as well as the religious privileges of his countrymen.

Aside from his ministerial character, Horatio G. Jones would have commanded a prominent position in society. A scion of a Revolutionary patriot, and a disciple of the school of Roger Williams, his life was a full flowing current of ennobling impulses and energetic action. Nearly fifty years ago, he quit the society of an endeared circle, and the emoluments of a lucrative station, and sought out the uninstructed and the destitute, to disseminate among them the truths of the blessed Gospel, and minister to their eternal interests. Through the vicissitudes and inclemencies of all seasons, and over a road of eight rugged miles, he met that devoted flock until mortally stricken, with a perseverance and punctuality that challenges any like exertions of the present age.

Born amid the agitations of the Revolutionary struggle, and reared at the shrine of Freedom, his earliest lispings were inspired by the teachings of a patriot sire, who was a chaplain to the Army of Independence, and his life was marked by a high sense of justice, and generous efforts to succor the weak and defend the oppressed. Persons ignorant of this temperament of mind, and not conversant with his private demeanor, might very easily impute to him worldly-mindedness and an acerbity of character which did not, in reality, attach to him. Thus, he might have been mistaken for an active partisan in almost any cause, from the freedom and earnest manner with which he would discuss matters of general interest and importance, to his neighbors, to the State, and to the nation; and for want of familiarity with that trait, wrong impressions of him would frequently be entertained in other matters. To his love of justice and strong yearnings to succor the oppressed, must be ascribed his generous espousal of the cause of the minority of one of the city churches, in a far-famed trouble which engendered bitter feelings, some years since. In that affair, I have always thought that he was misunderstood, and the more misunderstood because so formidable and so invincible. Being in daily intercourse with him at that time, I can confidently aver, that he acted from the single purpose of defending the weak and down-trodden. In that impression he may, or may not, have been mistaken, but certain I am, that he was prompted by the generous emotion of aiding and defending what he regarded as the rights of the oppressed. In the last war with England, when the arm of tyranny usurped, a second time, the rights of our countrymen, and the city of Philadelphia was threatened with invasion, his voice was raised to cheer the patriotism of the people in his own vicinity, and his hand and his purse were, alike, extended to supply the wants of the soldiers marching in defense of their homes, and in their absence to provide for their destitute families—their wives and children, their widows and their orphans. At the head of a committee appointed for that purpose, in his district, he was indefatigable in visiting them regularly, and supplying all their necessities.

Some twenty years since, he came forth from his retirement, from which neither gain nor ambition could seduce him, when he honestly believed that our free institutions were becoming insidiously undermined, and in imminent danger of being wrested from their legitimate purpose, by a secret association, and manfully cried aloud, and spared not. And more recently he devoted his energies, in hours which should have commanded some relaxation from long-continued effort and advancing age, to have a Collegiate Institute established to promote the higher branches of learning, in connection with his denominational predilections, and for the purpose of securing an education to the indigent sons of genius, and training them up for his Master's service. In all things he proved himself to be a workman not to be ashamed. In a word, he was a bright and faithful preacher, and as warm a personal friend, and as strong an advocate or invulnerable opponent, where principle was involved, or injustice demanded his aid, as might be found any where in the land.

This is not the fulsome effusion of blind partiality; it is but the award of justice due to his hard-earned merits, and are the sentiments, generally, of those who attended on his ministry and were acquainted with his private virtues. Ever declining all secular office of honor or profit, which his talents and probity induced his fellow-citizens frequently to proffer, without money and without price, he opened the streams of the Gospel fountain, and spread the sweet consolations of Revelation to a dying people; and toiling, single-handed, in the slow work of alluring perishing mortals to his Master, Christ Jesus, he planted the standard of the cross in a waste place, and erected a house of worship, (mainly by his own personal efforts,) to the glory of his Father in heaven. Until time shall moulder to ruins the Baptist Meeting-House of Lower Merion, it will stand a monument to his piety and his philanthropy; and until the wrestlings, the gushing gratitude of succored man on earth, and numberless beatified spirits in heaven, shall fail to obtain blessing at the throne of Grace, the stars in the crown of his rejoicing can never fade or wax old.

Pleasant are the memories, the thronging reminiscences, in private life, of our departed brother, who has now gone to mingle with the glorified spirits of his distinguished guests, who formerly loved to gather within his walls—the venerable Charles Thomson, Stanford, Rogers, Staughton, Holcomb, Rice, Montanye, Brown, Mathias, Dodge, and scores of others, with whom it was the privilege of the writer to be entertained together under that home-inspiring roof. Many years have passed away, but the warmth with which Elder Jones used his influence to advance the professional interests, and the cordiality with which he introduced to the fraternal attentions of his family, a youth who had gone out from his paternal fire-side to enter upon the theater of busy life, and dwell in a land of strangers, and the gracious manner in which he extended fatherly kindness and confidence, whereby the charms of home, sweet home, were vouchsafed to the lone one, during his sojourn away from the land of his kindred and the scenes of endearment, have never been forgotten, though more than a quarter of a century has elapsed; and never can be forgotten, but which shall be cherished while the natural heart-strings beat here below, and while the soul's identity and the consciousness of former kind offices endure in the spirit-land.

BORDENTOWN, N. J., Dec. 27, 1853.

THE PALESTINE MISSION.

The Committee on Outfit have learned with regret, that several vessels have already sailed from Boston for Smyrna and Beirut, which could have accommodated our missionaries, with their freight; but for want of time between the chartering of the vessels and the date of sailing, those opportunities were not improved—the missionaries and contributions being too far separated to get the necessary notice in season. It will probably be found necessary to have all things ready at Westerly, R. I., as a central point, as soon as can be conveniently arranged, that all may go at a day's notice to the point of embarkation. Most of the vessels engaged in the Mediterranean trade, sail within a few days of the time they are advertised. So that, unless all things are ready at some point near Boston, where such vessels are generally to be found, there would not be time, after notice is received, to get every thing on board comfortably.

There should be sent to the Committee an invoice of all articles contained in any box—setting forth the name of the articles, number, and price, each box marked, "Palestine, care of Charles Saunders, Westerly, R. I.," and sent by any of the conveyances, will be taken care of by the Committee, and shipped by the proper vessel. Where it is more convenient to send to New York, articles may be sent to the office of the Sabbath Recorder, 9 Spruce-st.

TROUBLES IN THE EAST AND MISSIONS.—We learn (through Eld. Isaac Moore) that Dr. Barclay, the missionary in Jerusalem from Baptists in Virginia, has signified to his friends that the troubles in that region will probably render his removal advisable, and they have authorized him to return home or remove to Malta. It is supposed that he has already gone to the latter place.

European News.

The steamship Canada, with one week later news from Europe, arrived at Boston January 6th.

The Turkish war shows no signs of relaxation, though the diplomatists continue to negotiate. A bloody engagement has taken place at Kalefat on the Danube, in which the Turks repulsed the Russians with great slaughter on both sides. From Asia there is nothing decisive, though it is reported that the Georgians aid and welcome the advancing Turks. The statement that Persia has declared war against the Porte is confirmed; the Shah is to furnish 30,000 soldiers to Russia. On the other hand, the Russian provinces of the Crimea and Kherson are said to be in a state of partial insurrection. The most important report is, however, that the allied fleets have entered the Black Sea, sailing, as it is said, in the direction of Sebastopol. This measure, though not equivalent to a declaration of war, looks more like it than any step previously taken by France and England.

The Russian Government has ordered that all foreign merchant ships going to Ottoman ports in the Black Sea shall be searched, and all carrying stores or munitions of war shall be seized, although sailing under a neutral flag. Turkey, on the contrary, has extended the term of 45 days ere Russian merchantmen shall be declared prizes.

Severe weather had been experienced on the Irish coast, and several shipwrecks are reported. The ship Niagara, with 150 passengers on board, went ashore at Wexford, cargo saved. The Pollock, from Liverpool for Apalachicola, put into Queenstown badly damaged.

Mr. Soulé, the United States Minister, had fought a duel with the Marquis de Turgot, the French Minister, owing to certain remarks of the latter on Mrs. Soulé's dress, before referred to. Lord Howden acted as the second of the Marquis de Turgot. A duel had also been fought between young Soulé and the Duke of Alba, growing out of the same affair. In neither case had any harm been done.

The insurgents keep firm possession of Shanghai, but had been defeated by the Imperialists at Amoy.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 3.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented numerous petitions praying for the construction of a ship-canal around Niagara Falls. Mr. Sumner presented a petition for a repeal of all duties on coal, and that it be made free. After some remarks by Messrs. Cass and Clayton, the papers were ordered to be printed, and after a short Executive Session the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the usual opening business was disposed of, the resolution tendering the thanks of Congress and a sword to Gen. Wool, was taken up and passed. Mr. McDonald offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Navy to communicate the number and names of steamers built for the United States since January, 1835, their tunnage, expense of building, &c. The House then proceeded to the consideration of Mr. Bennett's Land Bill. Mr. Perkins offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill repealing all duties on railroad iron, which was tabled by a vote of 78 to 65.

Mr. Washburn made a few remarks in favor of the Annexation of the Sandwich Islands, and the House then took up the Senate's resolution authorizing the President to confer the title of Lieutenant-General by brevet on Gen. Scott, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 5.

Mr. Cass offered a resolution, which was agreed to, directing inquiry as to the expediency of making an appropriation for the survey of all the harbors on Lake Superior. A resolution was adopted, inquiring into the costs of erecting a new building for the State Department. The Clayton and Bulwer correspondence was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and made the special order for Third-day next. The Senate then adjourned until Second-day.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the reading of the journal and the transaction of other preliminary business, the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported a resolution of thanks and a gold medal to Capt. Ingraham for his services in the Koszta affair, upon which a debate arose which lasted until the House adjourned, Mr. Perkins, of La., having the floor.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 6.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the reading of the Journal, the House took up the communication received from the War Department, transmitting a memorandum of the expenditures and the estimates for rivers and harbors, and after a short debate, the subject was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the private calendar, and after a short session, adjourned over until Third-day.

California News.

San Francisco papers to Dec. 7th, and over a million dollars in gold dust, were received in New York on the 5th inst., by steamer Illinois. From Alta California's "Summary of the Week," we clip the following items.

The weather has been very fine during the week. The rains of the middle of November have caused the grass to spring up, and the open valleys and hills are quite green with the new grass and wild oats.

The people of Northern California and Southern Oregon, are discussing the policy of uniting to form a new State. The proposition seems to find much favor there.

A Frenchman was hung by a mob at Yreka. The victim had committed murder. The mob acted with great violence and want of self-respect.

On the 28th November, a party of Indians from Clear Lake killed two Americans in the upper part of Napa Valley, and were themselves killed, except one taken prisoner The Americans talk of hanging him. The cause of the attack was, that the Indians at Clear Lake, about 400 in number, were angry at the failure of the United States to observe the stipulations of their treaty, and at bad treatment from the whites. It is feared that there will be serious trouble during the winter.

From the mines the news is favorable. The rivers are too high for mining in the beds. A fine quartz lead is said to have been discovered at Ophir.

The Peytona, the steamer to run between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands, is fitted up and will start for the Islands in a few days.

Another morning paper has been started. There are now 12 daily papers in San Francisco. Of these, two are evening papers, two are German, and three are party papers. Besides, there are two tri-weeklies (both French,) and five weeklies. To this list, it is confidently asserted that another morning paper, another evening paper, and a monthly magazine, will soon be added. As it is, 73 papers are issued weekly, without counting the weekly and steamer editions of the daily papers. San Francisco now claims to be the third city in the world, inferior only to London and New York, in her papers, quality and quantity both considered.

We have dates from Oregon to the 26th Nov. It is reported that some very rich mines, have been found on Coquille river. Two half breeds had dug 150 pounds of gold dust. The Indians in the South continue to give trouble.

☞ On the morning of second-day, Jan. 9, the steamships George Law from Aspinwall, and Star of the West from San Juan, arrived at New York, with nine days later dates, and nearly two million dollars in gold dust. Aside from the reported destruction by the Mexicans of a portion of Captain Walker's men, who recently proclaimed Lower California a Republic, the news is unimportant. Two hundred and fifty men sailed from San Francisco on the 13th of December, in the bark Oneta, to join President Walker at Lower California.

Legislature of New York—Governor's Message.

The Legislature of New York convened at Albany on Third-day, Jan. 3d, and was promptly organized. In the afternoon, the Governor sent in his Annual Message—a long document, of which we do not think it worth while to copy more than what relates to Schools, Public Charities, and Temperance.

Common Schools.

The abstracts accompanying the Annual Report of the Superintendent of Common Schools, will show their present condition, and the amount of money apportioned for their use during the coming year.

The amount of the Common School Fund on the 30th of September last was $2,383,251 23; being an increase over the last fiscal year of $28,727 14.

It is estimated that the revenue of the fund during the current year, will justify an increased appropriation of $10,000. The total amount of moneys apportioned by the Superintendent for the coming year, is $1,101,240 84. This sum is made up of the following items: Avails of State Tax $800,000 00; Appropriation from Common School and United States Deposit Fund $300,000 00; Balance in the hands of State Superintendent $1,240 84. Total $1,101,240 84.

The number of Schools in 1852, was 11,684. Whole number of children taught in District Schools 866,935; Number attending private schools 36,844; Number of children attending colored schools 1,680; Average number of months that schools were taught in the districts by duly qualified teachers 7,010; Number of volumes in district libraries 1,604,210: Amount paid for teachers' wages $1,931,870 18; Amount paid for district libraries $49,499 39. Total amount expended for Common Schools $2,469,248 52.

The subject of Common School Education at this time attracts a large share of attention. Many public spirited citizens have interested themselves in devising and promoting measures to extend the advantages of education—to improve its systems—to elevate its character, and to adapt it to the wants of those engaged in the different pursuits of life. We have reason to hope that their labors and investigations will lead to the adoption and practical success of measures which will be productive of decided advantages. A number of academies have recently been established in different sections of our State, and the numerous attendance of pupils shows that the benefits of education are generally appreciated. The office of the teacher is held in much greater esteem than it was a few years since. The influence of the Normal School is felt throughout the State, as it furnishes an increasing body of teachers, whose superior acquirements and competency have shown the great advantages of well educated and thoroughly prepared instructors.

I recommend the separation of the office of Superintendent of Common Schools from that of the Secretary of State. The establishment of a distinct department devoted to the interests of education, is calculated to give more prominence to the subject, and to elevate it in public estimation. Every effort should be made to harmonize our system of instruction—to do away with the impression that our colleges and academies are institutions of learning distinct from, if not in some degree antagonistic to our Common Schools. This measure would also facilitate the establishment of agricultural or mechanical colleges, designed for instruction in the practical sciences.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State in his last annual report, I suggest the propriety of establishing State scholarships in our higher institutions of learning, for the purpose of educating young men for the principals of union and high schools; and that the advantages of the endowments be conferred upon the meritorious pupils in the different counties or Assembly Districts. If this system is adopted, it will serve the double purpose of elevating our common schools and of promoting merit—and at the same time afford aid to our colleges in a manner free from the objections which exist in the minds of many, to giving the public funds to institutions which are supposed to benefit only a small portion of the community.

Public Charities.

The Asylum for the Training and Education of Idiotic and Imbecil Children has, during the last year, continued its successful progress, and has invigorated the hopes and confirmed the expectations of those citizens who had faith in the power of discipline to develop the faculties of this hapless class. Their gradual advance from the lowest degrees of imbecility, to a capacity for self-control and for the acquisition of the ordinary branches of an English education, has been as remarkable as it has been encouraging. Numerous applications, from every quarter of the State, for the admission of pupils, have been unsuccessful, in consequence of the want of room for their accommodation. The appropriation made at the last session of the Legislature for the erection of a suitable building, was found to be inadequate for the purpose; and although the trustees have procured a site, they have very properly abstained from entering into further engagements that would involve expenditures beyond the amount directed by the Legislature. In the annual report they will present a full account of their proceedings and of the condition of the Asylum; and the urgent reasons for such an increase in the appropriation as is necessary to complete an edifice, with its appropriate appurtenances, adapted to the objects and commensurate with its importance. I cannot forbear commending to your most favorable consideration this excellent charity. The strict economy, prudence, fidelity, and respect to legislative direction, with which its affairs have been managed, furnish satisfactory assurance that no more will be asked than is really necessary, and that what may be granted will be faithfully and judiciously applied.

There are at this time 446 patients in the State Lunatic Asylum at Utica, and 556 in the Lunatic Asylums on Blackwell's Island. It appears by the reports which have been submitted to me, that the efforts to improve the condition of this unfortunate class of persons have been attended with the usual degree of success. I renew the recommendation contained in my message of last year, for the establishment of another Asylum in the western part of the State. The accommodations at the Asylum on Blackwell's Island and at Utica, are insufficient for the present number of inmates; and admission has been refused to a large number of persons.

There are 111 pupils in the New York Asylum for the Blind, and 55 persons afflicted with the loss of sight employed in teaching in the different departments, or as operatives in the manufactories attached to the establishment. It not only affords instruction to pupils, but (by the employment which it gives in its workshops) supports a large number of blind persons, some of whom have families dependent upon them.

The Directors of the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, have determined to remove it to a more favorable site, on which they are erecting buildings which will contain ample accommodations. This Institution continues to fulfill the objects of its benevolent founders. It now contains 280 pupils, 192 of whom are beneficiaries of the State of New York. In addition to the intellectual instruction which they receive, they are also taught trades, which will enable them to support themselves. It is unnecessary for me to add any words of commendation of the Asylums for the Insane, the Deaf and Dumb, and the Blind. Their successful management for a long series of years has firmly established them in the public favor and confidence.

Temperance.

During the past year intemperance has been a prominent topic of public discussion and interest. It is justly regarded as a fruitful source of misery, destitution and crime, and its effects are forced in a painful manner upon the attention of those who are required to execute the laws. Our present statutes with respect to licenses have not been strictly enforced in our large commercial towns and cities. It is difficult to say if this is owing to the defects and insufficiency of the system, or to the nature of the subject. Various statutes have at different times been passed in this State to limit and regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors; but heretofore the restraints of education, morality and religion, and the efforts of philanthropic individuals and associations, have been more effective than legislative enactments to check intemperance. Its evils have been aggravated by the practice which has greatly increased within a few years, of using deleterious drugs in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, which have been productive of most pernicious effects upon the mental and physical condition of those who use them. The whole subject will doubtless engage your attention. It is surrounded with difficulties and embarrassments, and unless the legislation in regard to it is judicious, it will increase the evils which it is so important to prevent. Any measures which you may adopt should be framed so as not to conflict with well settled principles of legislation, or with the rights of our citizens.

Recent Disasters.

A dispatch dated Halifax, Jan. 3, says: The clipper-ship Staffordshire, Capt. Richardson, of and for Boston, from Liverpool, struck on Blond Rock, south of Cape Sable, about 1 o'clock on Friday morning, the 30th ult., and almost immediately went down, carrying with it about 180 persons. The Staffordshire had a valuable cargo, and is insured for $100,000. The first and second mates and 17 seamen reached Cape Sable; the third mate, boatswain, and 12 others, were picked up and landed at Shelbourne, N. S., and Capt. Richardson and the remainder on board, about 180 persons, mostly Irish emigrants, went down in the wreck immediately after striking.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Jan. 2, says: The river steamer Pearl, bound to New Orleans with a cargo of sugar, sunk on Saturday night, and it is supposed eighteen lives were lost.

A dispatch dated Providence, Jan. 2, says: A gentleman from Provincetown on Saturday says there are vessels ashore on all parts of the Cape, and that twenty lives are known to be lost. Parts of wrecks are all the time drifting ashore of vessels that must have been swamped in the gale, and whose crews doubtless perished. There has never before been known such distress on the shores of Cape Cod.

Accounts from Provincetown state that the schooner Mount Vernon, of Westport, Me., with hard pine lumber, is wrecked on the East Coast, near Welfleet, and all hands but one lost. The captain was found dead in the cabin.

By dispatches from Halifax, we learn that the new steamship San Francisco, which sailed from New York on the 21st ult., for San Francisco viâ the Straits of Magellan, having on board about 500 troops for California, was fallen in with on the 26th, in latitude 38 20, longitude 69, completely disabled, with her decks swept and boats gone. The bark Maria Freeman, arrived at Liverpool, N. S., was the vessel which fell in with her and reports that she could render her no assistance as she drifted out of sight during the gale.

Since the above report was received, Government has sent a steamer in search of the San Francisco, and a steamer has also been sent out by the owners.

The N. Y. Tribune of Jan. 7, says:—

One of those fierce wintry gales that sweeps through our northern latitudes with such destructive fury, during the latter part of every returning December, has just passed over us, leaving behind it the dismal wrecks of hundreds of vessels, strewed along the coast and over the ocean, from Long Island to Cape Sable. Our columns for the last week have groaned under the long lists of maritime disasters, which seem to have been more numerous than ever before, even at this fatal period of the year. No class of vessels has been exempted from the desolating march of the elements. The beautiful clipper Staffordshire, with her rich freight of commodities, and richer freight of human beings, went down in an hour beneath the raving surges, amid the howlings of pitiless winds, and the fierce blasts of snow, and hail, and sleet, and the more piercing midnight wail of hundreds of victims, cut to the bone by the frozen edges of the flying spray, as they were launched, drowned and frozen, from time into eternity. The new steamer San Francisco, too, but just from this port, is reported as rolling helpless upon the billows, with eight hundred souls on board, who, there is too much reason to fear, have already been engulfed in the wide and angry waters of the Atlantic.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY BURNT.—A dispatch dated Portland, Saturday, Jan. 7, 1854, says: At six o'clock this morning, a fire broke out in the Custom-House Building, on Washington street, and at eight o'clock the entire edifice was in ruins. Besides the offices of the Customs, the building contained the Post-Office, Reading-Rooms, Atlantic Bank, the United States Court Rooms, the rooms of the Society of Natural History, J. S. Bailey's bookstore, and offices used for other purposes. Every thing in the Post-Office and store of Mr. Bailey was saved, but the contents of the Customs offices, the splendid collection of the Natural History Society, Judge Ware's valuable law library. Reading-Rooms, Court Rooms, and all the other offices, were entirely destroyed. The loss is very heavy, but will mostly fall on Government. The edifice was formerly the Merchants' Exchange, but was some years ago sold to the United States Government for $120,000. It will probably cost $300,000 to rebuild it.

ANOTHER GREAT FIRE IN NEW YORK.—On Sunday morning last, New York was visited by another conflagration. Between twelve and one o'clock a fire broke out in Metropolitan Hall, which was not subdued until that building, together with the new and splendid Lafarge Hotel, was a heap of ruins. The Hotel, which was intended to have surpassed all others, was nearly completed and furnished, and would have been opened in a few days. The furniture was worth about $200,000, on which there was an insurance of $17,000. The Hall and Hotel were owned by John Lafarge, and valued at $340,000, on which there was insurance amounting to $55,000 on the Hall, and $117,000 on the Hotel. Half a million of dollars is the estimated loss by this fire.

Miscellaneous.

The Editor's Advisers.

Says one, "Your subjects are too grave,
Too much morality you have—
Too much about religion;
Give me some witch or wizzard tales,
With slip-shod ghosts, with fins and scales,
Or feathers like a pigeon."

"I love to read," another cries,
"Those monstrous fashionable lies—
In other words, those novels,
Composed of kings, and queens, and lords,
Of border wars and Gothic hordes,
That used to live in hovels."

"No—no!" cries one, "we've had enough
Of such confounded love-sick stuff,
To craze the fair creation;
Give us some recent news,
Of Russian Turk, the Greeks and Jews,
Or any other nation."

Another cries, "I want more fun,
A witty anecdote or pun,
A rebus or a riddle;"
Some long for missionary news,
And some, of worldly carnal views,
Would like to hear a fiddle.

Another cries, "I want to see
A jumbled up variety—
Variety in all things,
A miscellaneous hodge-podge print,
Composed—only to give the hint—
Of multifarious small things."

"I want some marriage news," says miss,
"It constitutes my highest bliss
To hear of weddings plenty;
For in a time of general rain,
None suffers from a drought, 'tis plain—,
At least not one in twenty."

"I want to hear of dearth," says one,
"Of people totally undone,
By losses, fire, or fever;"
Another answers, full as wise,
"I'd rather have the fall and rise
Of raccoon skins or beaver."

Some signify a secret wish,
For now and then a savory dish
Of politics to suit them;
But here we rest in perfect ease,
For, should they say the moon was cheese,
We never would dispute them.

Or grave or humorous, wild or tame,
Lofty or low, 'tis all the same,
Too haughty or too humble;
And every editorial wight
Has naught to do but what is right,
And let the grumbler grumble.

The Poison-Eaters.

There are persons in the highlands of Austria who make a common practice of eating arsenic, or poison. A certain Doctor Tschudi, though he has made no new discoveries respecting arsenic eating, has added several interesting cases to his list, for the interest and instruction of the public. We quote from Chambers' Journal:—

Dr. Tschudi's further investigations on the subject of arsenic-eating have led to no new discoveries; but they have enabled him to add a few more examples to those he had already given. In every instance, the poison-eater, when first questioned on the matter, denied his propensity with the most determined obstinacy. The confessions of one individual prove a consumption of poison, in a certain number of years, which is most extraordinary. From his twenty-seventh to his sixty-third year, this person was accustomed to take, each month, during several days, a dose of arsenic. He began, as usual, with a portion not larger than a grain of linseed, and for a long succession of years kept to this quantity. On weighing a piece of Hungarian arsenic, such as the man had been accustomed to take, it was found to vary from two to four grains. When asked why he had not increased his dose, he replied, he had not the courage to do so; for having attempted it once, when tipsy, and not at the ordinary time, the consequence was severe attacks of colic, a burning in the throat, and throbbing in the stomach. The bit he then swallowed was, however, pretty large. For more than two years he had entirely given up the practice, which he accounted for by saying that one of his acquaintances—an old poison-eater—had died of dropsy, after much suffering. He thought that illness had been caused by the use of arsenic, and, as he greatly feared a like fate, he had of late wholly abstained from his accustomed hidri.

Since his discontinuance of arsenic, this man has suffered from time to time from very severe attacks of colic; but, during the whole period of his use of poison, he was unwell but once, and then from inflammation of the lungs. All the persons in the house where he lived had the itch for a long time; and although he was in constant contact with them, he was never attacked by the disease. In the course of the thirty-five years that this individual was accustomed to eat poison, he must, according to computation, have swallowed from twenty to twenty-two ounces of arsenic; and yet this enormous quantity of the most powerful mineral poison caused no observable derangement in his functions, except a certain hoarseness of voice—which, as it would appear, is peculiar to all poison-eaters.

It seems to be a general rule—observed, also, by the persons just spoken of—that the arsenic must be taken when the moon is on the increase, and never, except under peculiar circumstances, when it is on the wane.

There are various methods of taking the dose. Some, when fasting, put a small morsel in their mouth, and let it gradually dissolve; others reduce it to powder, and strew it on a slice of bread or bacon.

It is not uninteresting to mention here an attempt at murder which occurred at the end of 1851, connected as it is with the effects of arsenic on the human system. One of the servants of a family, living in the north of France, was desirous of getting rid of his mistress, on account of the strict control she exercised over the household. For this purpose he mixed small doses of arsenic with her food, during a considerable length of time, probably from the belief that a slow and gradual death by poison would avert all suspicion of a violent death. To his no small astonishment, however, he saw that, in the course of some months, the lady not only grew stouter, but improved in her good looks. Her countenance was fresher, and she was much gayer than before. As the small doses, instead of having the desired result, produced quite a contrary one, he mixed a considerably larger quantity of arsenic with some stewed chicken, and, soon after this was eaten by the lady, such decided symptoms of poisoning appeared, that the attempt at murder was discovered.

It was already known that certain individuals in mountainous districts were accustomed to the use of arsenic, for the sake of giving them "good wind;" but Dr. Tschudi has since discovered that in Salzburg and Tyrol, as well as in Styria, and the highlands of Austria, the custom of eating arsenic is very general, especially among the chamois-hunters.

Dr. Tschudi gives, further, the following most curious communication, received by him from a perfectly trustworthy source:—

"Mr. F. St——, Director of the arsenic mines in M——kl, in L——au, has been accustomed to take daily, at breakfast, for a number of years past, a small quantity of powdered arsenic, as much as would lie on the tip of his knife, to protect him—as he asserts—from the injurious effects arising from the fabrication of arsenic. At the request of a physician, he sent him a similar quantity, such as he had been daily in the habit of taking—being guided in the dose solely by the eye—and the portion was found to weigh three grains and three-fourths. He has thus been in the habit of taking daily between three and four grains of arsenic, at the same time enjoying most excellent health. It is said that he gives his workmen systematic instructions as to how they are to proceed in the enjoyment of arsenic, in order to preserve themselves from the hurtful effects caused by its preparation."

It has already been stated that it is a common practice in Austria—in Vienna especially—to give horses occasional doses of arsenic, in order to improve their coat, and add to its appearance. Various are the methods of giving it to animals, and, although each person adheres to his own particular practice, yet all agree on one point—that the arsenic ought to be given only when the moon is on the increase. Some give it daily, during this period, in doses of from three to four grains; others administer it in a larger quantity, for two consecutive days before the moon is at the full, and then omit it for two days, during which time the animal is given, once in the week, an aperient of aloes. The grooms and farm-servants, however, are very particular in giving the arsenic after the animal has fed and drank, strewing it generally in the form of powder on a piece of bread. If, however, the horse is to have his dose while at work, the lump of poison is then wrapped in a linen rag, or is strewed in a powdered state on a piece of bacon, and wrapped round the bit or curb. A portion of the arsenic would seem to be voided with the excrement; for it has often been observed that fowls have died after eating corn found in the dung of horses dosed with arsenic. Horses fed on oats are, as is well known, subject to attacks of colic; but the grooms assert that if arsenic be mixed with the grain, no illness of the sort ever takes place.

With cattle the use of arsenic is less frequent, and is employed only in the case of fatted oxen and calves. The same rules are observed with regard to the moon as those alluded to above; and the poison is strewed in a powdered state on their food. The effect on the size of the animal is very striking; the increase of weight, however, being in no proportion to the increas eof bulk. For this reason the butchers never buy such oxen according to the looks of the living animal—the real weight of the flesh being always much less than the apparent weight. It is the same with calves, to which the arsenic is given, strewed on wheaten bread. On account of this manner of fattening cattle for the market, many a peasant or grazier in Styria and Upper Austria is known by the name of Hidribauer—arsenic-peasant, poison-peasant.

To pigs arsenic is often given, especially at the beginning of the fattening time. In many hand-books for breeders of cattle, it is recommended to strew a dose of sulphuret of antimony daily on the food of the pigs. Now, it has been remarked, that the purified antimony bought at druggists—Antimonium sulphuratum nigrum læuigatum—has no effect whatever; while the sulphuret of antimony purchased at the oil and color shops proves efficacious—which arises, probably, from the circumstance that the latter usually contains no inconsiderable quantity of sulphur.

Obsolete Laws.

The people of this country, and particularly those who reside in the New England States, are more famous for the number of their laws, than for their observance of the same. From the earliest enactments in the Massachusetts Colony, to the latest edition of the Revised Statutes, there has been a large number of laws standing in the books, which are obsolete in practice, and are of use only to show how far Buncombe has been consulted in their original enactment, or in the refusal to repeal them.

Dr. Channing, in one of his admirable essays, remarks that "opinion is stronger than kings." He might have added, that public opinion in a free country is stronger than the law. There is a law of common sense and practical wisdom, which the great mass of the people intuitively acknowledge and obey, and their instincts fail to recognize the criminality of the violation of these obsolete statutes. The law may be rigid and legally right, and the penalty severe, but the public judgment, and the innate sense of justice in the community, repel the thought of crime connected with a breach of the code. The Legislature has created a crime, which the inherent instincts of men fail to recognize, on account of the violation of the most potent springs of human action.

For illustration: the Saturday evening concerts of the Germanians, and all Saturday evening secular concerts, including Sontag's, are unlawful gatherings. It is against the 5th Section of the 50th Chapter of the Revised Statutes, to be present at one of them. This obsolete law seems aimed rather at the audience than the performers. The fines incurred at a popular concert in the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, would amount to upwards of $17,000! By an enforcement of the Sunday law, there would be but little news in the daily papers on Monday mornings, and a sudden veto would be put upon much of the social visiting now so common in this city and among our suburban friends. Parents, also, who are "present at any game, play, or diversion" of their children, on Saturday evenings, are liable to a fine! And, of course, a rubber of whist, a game of cribbage, or the use of a backgammon table in one's own family, fall within the penalty of the statute. Most of these laws were passed in their present form upwards of sixty years ago, and were re-enactments of the old Puritan code.

The usury laws are against the commercial customs of the mercantile community, and business in Massachusetts would come to rather a sudden stand if the 35th Chapter of the Revised Statutes was to be observed for many days in these times of financial pressure.

We might extend the list of these obsolete statutes to a great extent, but it seems to be understood in the community, that we must have one branch of the government at work a third of the time to make laws which are not intended to be enforced. In this respect, our government is unlike any other, and we should have merry times in Boston, if some pleasant morning we should wake up, and find that the obsolete laws of Massachusetts were for once to be executed.

Water Works at Watertown.

Messrs. J. Ball & Co., of this City, have been constructing Water Works at Watertown, N. Y., under a great head. We are informed that the water is forced from the Black River through their pipes into a reservoir some 7,000 feet from the river, and elevated about 190 feet above the pump well. The Democratic Union speaks of the trial as follows:—

"The trial of the Water Works on Saturday morning was in the highest degree gratifying to all the friends of that noble enterprise. Several hydrants were tried, and all worked to admiration. We witnessed the one near the Arcade entrance, which threw water in a perpendicular direction to the distance of 40 feet above the buildings. The fountain threw a jet of water to the hight of 80 feet. It is well to remark that the triumph of the Water Works at this trial was effected without letting on the full head of water. It is estimated that under a full head, the fountain will throw its jet to the hight of 110 feet. The reservoir is situated about one mile from the center of the village, at an elevation of 190 feet above the fountain. It will contain 3,500,000 gallons. The pump by which the water is forced from the Black River to the reservoir, was constructed by Hoard & Bradford. There are 65 hydrants, situated at different points in the corporation. The one at the Railroad dépôt is said to be over 200 feet below the reservoir. We reckon there will be some spouting if that hydrant should ever be uncapped under a full head of water. Eight of these hydrants can be brought to bear, at the same time, on any of the principal buildings. Mr. Ball, the enterprising and reliable contracter for the construction of the pipes, has finally triumphed nobly, in spite of the cavilings of croakers and fault-finders. The trial was a pretty good indorsement of his bonds. All credit is due to those of our citizens who have projected, encouraged and sustained this great enterprise.

Souring Food for Cattle and Hogs.

The cause is rather remote upon which this principle is based. It is asserted upon good authority, that Rye, Barley, or Indian corn meal, made into a mash and allowed to ferment and pass into the same state, when mixed with cut hay, straw, or other dry vegetable food, exhibits the most marked fattening effects. A very consistent and observing friend of ours, remarked the other day, that he could with barley meal alone, properly fermented and soured, make hogs as fat in six weeks, as they could, or ought to be, and that he preferred such process to cooking the food or any other method.

It is a familiar fact, to all feeders of swine, that sour and coagulated milk is worth one quarter more for those animals, than fresh and sweet milk; but how its action in that state is to be accounted for, and its operation on the animal economy of the stomach, is not very apparent. It is known by the experiments of Dr. Beaumont, that milk, and all substances capable of coagulation, are almost instantly changed on mixing with the gastric juice, and the rejection of milk by the infant immediately after sucking, also shows that fact.

Now, whether the souring of the food relieves the action of the digestive process, or whether the acetic milic, or other acids, are required by the stomach to effect secretion or stimulation, is simple conjecture. With the human subject, pickles are a favorite condiment with rich and highly concentrated food, and many delicate stomachs can endure the use of large quantities of these most indigestible and unnutritive substances, without experiencing any deleterious effects. It is generally held, that those persons who consume much acid food, and use vinegar and pickles freely, are apt to be thin and spare, contrary to the doctrine of souring food. We once knew a young lady so fleshy and full of "blood and blue veins," that her skin was almost to the tension of bursting, who reduced herself to very respectable wasp-like dimensions, merely by the free use of vinegar. Of the good effects of the souring process, when used for fattening animals, we have the most abundant proofs in our own experience.

The Girl with a Tin Pail.

Some twenty years ago I was an apprentice boy in the then "City of Mud," now the goodly city of Rochester. The business of which I was obtaining a knowledge, was conducted upon Exchange street, though I boarded in one of the streets in the western part of the city.

In going to my tea, I was in the habit of meeting, almost every evening, for many weeks in succession, a small, well-dressed, and good-looking girl, with a pail in her hand. At length my curiosity became excited, and I resolved to ascertain, if possible, the errand of the girl. Having met her the following evening, I accordingly turned on my heel, and followed her at a distance that would not excite suspicion in any one. I at length saw her enter a small shoemaker's shop on South St. Paul's street. I subsequently learned that the shop was owned by an industrious young man, an excellent mechanic, and that he was the girl's husband. He had been married a few months, and possessing no other capital than a good name and robust constitution, had resolved to economize by hiring a house in the suburbs of the city.

His breakfast was always ready for him by day-break, and taking his dinner with him, he saved the hour each day which most persons spend in going to and in coming from that meal. Many economists would have been satisfied with the saving of so much time as this between the rising and going down of the sun, but not so with the young shoemaker. He also wished to save the hour usually devoted to tea, and therefore had that daily meal taken to him by his pretty little wife. This arrangement enabled him to spend the whole day, and as much of the evening as he chose in his shop.

The industrious habits of the shoemaker were soon discovered, and met with their due reward. Customers flocked in upon him, and he was obliged not only to rent a larger shop, but to employ an additional number of workmen. But the increase of business did not wean him from the plan he had early adopted for the saving of time—this third meal still having been taken to him by his wife, in the tin pail.

About that time I left the city, and did not return for about twelve years. I had not, however, forgotten the shoemaker, having, from my first knowledge of him, discovered the germ of success, in his manner of life. I visited the place where his old shop had stood; it had given place to a new brick block. In vain I looked about for the sign—it was no where to be seen. I was at length informed by a friend that about two years previous he had removed to Ohio.

"Do you know any thing of the circumstances?" I required.

"I do. In the first place he took to Ohio about five thousand dollars in cash, some three thousand of which he invested in real estate near Cincinnati; he has already realized three times the amount. The other two thousand he put into a pork establishment, and that sum yielded him a large profit. But if he had not resorted to speculation, he could not but have succeeded in life, so thorough were his business habits, and especially as those habits are seconded by an industrious little wife."

I have recently returned from a visit to Ohio, and have again seen the shoemaker and his wife. He is now in the prime of life, and possesses an ample fortune, and an unsullied reputation for honor and probity. Never having had any personal acquaintance with him, I introduced myself as a Rochesteronian. This was late in the afternoon. I very cheerfully accepted an invitation to take tea with him. Improving a moment of silence at the table, I remarked:—

"I fear, Mr. H., you are not so great an economist of time as you used to be?"

"Why not?" he inquired.

"When first I became acquainted with Mrs. H., you could not afford to go home to tea, and she used to carry it to you."

"In a little tin pail," said she, bursting into a laugh.

"Exactly."

"Indeed, Mr. W., have you known us so long?"

I then made myself known as the former apprentice of Mr. R., and was immediately recognized by Mrs. H., as one of her earliest street acquaintances in Rochester.

"But that pail; what do you think has become of that?" asked Mr. H.

"That I suppose, has long since been numbered with the things that were," I answered.

"By no means," he said, at the same time tipping a wink to his wife.

She arose from the table, and left the room, and soon returned with the identical pail, as they both assured me.

I need not say that it bore palpable marks of the ravages of time.

"But what is your object in preserving that pail?"

"Its associations. We look upon it as one of the earliest instruments which contributed to our success in life, and as such we shall ever cherish it."

I soon took my leave of Mr. and Mrs. H., and their interesting and happy family; and not a day since then has my mind been without its remembrance of the Girl and her Tin Pail.

Winter Fattening Unprofitable.

Many farmers have adopted the practice of fattening their animals, especially swine, during the winter. Last February, we saw scores of loads of pork, in the carcass, on the way to market, on the line of our New England railroads. We suppose this practice has been adopted because this season affords more leisure for threshing and grinding corn, grain, &c., and more time to attend to feeding. Science, however, as well as experience, affords us some sure light on this subject. It is now settled, almost beyond a doubt, that in the animal economy, while the bones serve as a frame-work, and the muscles as the organs of strength and motion, the principal use of fat is to keep up the heat of the system. The temperature of all warm-blooded animals is, at most times, higher than that of the surrounding atmosphere, and the consumption of fat in the body is constantly required to keep up this elevation of temperature. The amount of heat given off from the surface of the body depends upon the relative coldness of the air. In cold weather, then, more fat producing, that is more heat-producing food, is required to sustain the animal, than in warm weather; and from the same amount of food there will be less surplus fat left to increase the bulk. To illustrate: suppose that in October an animal requires ten pounds of corn a day to supply the loss of heat, while fifteen pounds are daily consumed. This will leave five pounds of the corn, or thirty-three per cent., to go to increase the bulk or weight. But in January or February, owing to the increased coldness of the air, the same animal will probably require one-fifth more food; that is, twelve pounds of corn, to keep up the natural warmth of the body. This will leave but three pounds of corn, or twenty per cent., to increase the weight; or, what is the same thing, twenty per cent. more food must be given, to produce an increase of weight in January, equal to that of October. This is a fair illustration of what is actually the case, though the figures given may be wide of the mark. Another suggestion arises in this connection, viz—that fattening animals especially should be protected, as much as possible, from cold, by keeping them in warm enclosures.

Moderate Drinking.

"It can never injure me," said a young man recently in our hearing, "I drink very moderately." "Glad to hear it," we replied, "although we should feel that you were on safer ground if you had said, I do not drink at all. And if you must continue in the practice, we hope for your own sake, and the sake of those with whom you are connected in the endearing relations of life, it may be ever so with you. But look at the locomotive! (we were near a station house,) see how moderately she starts; now it moves with a fitful jerk or two, felt through all the cars, and now where is it?—beyond your sight!" The young man was at a stand. "But," said he, "I am a moderate eater to-day; I can be so to-morrow, and all my life long. Why not talk against moderate eating, lest a man become a glutton!" "Much for the same reason," we said, "that we should not warn against an immoderate rush in a well-trained horse. It is not in his nature. But get up the steam in a locomotive, and who shall control it? Get up the steam in a man, and where is he? Your food does not create this stimulant. The more a man eats, the more sluggish he is, and soon his soul loathes that in which he delighted. He must moderate. But not so with strong drink. It is the steam in a locomotive. It causes you to move gently to-day, rapidly to-morrow, furiously next day, when you may take an awful plunge, never to be recovered. You may be a moderate drinker of water, and be contentedly so all your days. But alcohol is a subtle poison, affecting every nerve in your system—weakening all, and requiring more to raise you up to your wonted height—making you yourself yield to that which you say shall be your servant—placing you at its feet—filling you with anguish indescribable if you cannot have it, and plunging you to the lowest depths when you can."

Lot's Wife.

A French savant, M. de Saulcy, gives the following interpretation of the sacred narrative of Lot's wife:—

"The Djebbel-el-Melehh, or Djebel-Sodum, presents a compact mass of rock salt, the height of which varies, but never exceeds 100 yards. At the summit, the salt is covered over by a stratum of clay of a dirty white hue. The whole of the hill side presents numerous fissures hollowed by the winter torrents, and the constant crumbling of the soil. At many points appear vast pyramidal columns of salt, one of which has no doubt been taken by Captain Lynch for the famous pillar into which Lot's wife was transformed. All the disconnected masses, and those which still adhere to the mountain, have their surfaces deeply furrowed and indented by the rains. And lastly, wherever the rock leans over, its lower part is hung with stalactites of salt. Is it possible to explain the death of Lot's wife? I am inclined to believe so, and this would be my solution: At the moment when the huge mountain was heaved up volcanically, there must have been throughout its whole extent tremenduous falls of detached masses, similar to those we have observed at every step. Lot's wife having loitered behind, either through fright or curiosity, was most likely crushed by one of these descending fragments, and when Lot and his children turned round to look toward the place where she had stopped, they saw nothing but the salt rock which covered her body. The catastrophe may be explained in many ways; but having visited the spot, I hold to the opinion I have now advanced, without seeking, however, to impose it on others."

Paddle your own Canoe.

Young man, you must paddle your own canoe! It is, on the whole, better that you should. See that young man who gets in a canoe bought with the money of his parents or his friends. When the vessel is launched, he must have it paddled by hired hands, while he lolls back, and perhaps sees nothing but an unsubstantial shadow of himself in the smooth waters. By and by the canoe, through carelessness and presumptuous steering, is dashed among the rapids, and he goes down. Should he come up again, he finds that he is abandoned by all, and that he has made a wreck, where he might have made a fortune.

Young man or woman! paddle your own canoe. Even if you are favored with parents and friends who can give you one, be sure you earn it by the worthiness of your lives. In high purposes, in noble resolves, in generous deeds, in purity and virtuous endurance, and blameless conversation, let your endeavors to paddle your own canoe be seen by all. Pull away! If the paddle breaks while pulling against the rapids, have another ready. If you have but one, pull with the stump of the old. Don't relax one effort. One stroke lost, and it may be the fatal one. Pull away! —your canoe, if you have built it, like your friends, of the right material in your character, will hold as long as yourself will. Pull away, and before long you may find yourself in as fair a haven as the man that "paddles his own canoe."

Great Difference with Little Change.

An ingenious expedient was once devised to save a prisoner charged with robbery, in the Criminal Court at Dublin. The principal thing that appeared in evidence against him, was a confession alledged to have been made by him at the police office, and taken down by a police officer, in writing, and the following passage was read from it:

"Magnam said he never robbed but twice said it was Crawford."

This, it will be observed, has no mark of the writer's having any notion of punctuation, but the meaning he attached to it was this:

"Magnam said he never robbed but twice; said it was Crawford."

Mr. O'Gormon, the counsel for the prisoner, begged to look at the paper. He perused it, and rather astonished the police officer by asserting that so far from proving the guilt of the prisoner, it clearly proved his innocence.

"This," said the legal gentleman, "is the fair and obvious reading of the sentence:

"Magnam said he never robbed, but twice said it was Crawford."

This interpretation had its effect upon the jury, and the man was acquitted.

New York City.—A recent publication furnishes some interesting statistics. The number of persons employed and paid out of the city treasury is 3743. The expeditures of the city for 1852, were $8,294,241, and the receipts $13,884,856, and a funded debt of $1,005,000. In 1805, the value of real and personal property was $25,646,867; in 1852, it was $351,758,426. The income from the Croton water works has risen from $91,790, in 1843–4, to $533,765 in 1852. There are 239 miles of pipe used in conveying this water through the city. There are 19 public parks, the value of which is placed at $9,151,000, the most valuable of which is the Battery, $3,000,000. There are 774 omnibuses in the city. The number of deaths in 1852 was 21,601.

The Ausburg Zeitung announces that Dr. Landoifi, physician to the King of Naples, and director of the principal hospital of that city, has discovered a cure for cancer, even in its last stages; that he has effected an entire cure of a lady of rank, and several other persons in Munich, suffering from the disease, in presence of the most distinguished physicians of the city, and has left Munich for North Germany to attend a Princess who is afflicted with the same dreadful malady. He will shortly, it is said, publish an account of his discovery.

A right education is not merely the reading of many books, but the ability of making knowledge useful to ourselves and others. It is not simply to acquire influence over our fellow-creatures, but to make that influence subservient to moral excellence and piety.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

SPEECH OF GERRIT SMITH.

Delivered in Congress, Dec. 20, 1853, on the Reference of the President's Message.

It is natural, Mr. Chairman—nay, it is almost necessary—that, from the difference in our temperament, our education, our pursuits, and our circumstances, we should take different views of many a subject, which comes before us. But, if we are only kind in expressing these views, and patient in listening to them, no harm, but, on the contrary, great good, will come from our discussions.

As this is the first time I have had the floor, it may be well for me now to confess, that I am in the habit of freely imputing errors to my fellow men. Perhaps I shall fall into this habit on the present occasion. It may be a bad habit. But is it not atoned for by the fact, that I do not claim that I am myself exempt from errors; that I acknowledge, that I abound in them; and that I am ever willing that those, whom I assail, shall make reprisals? I trust, Sir, that so long as I shall have the honor to hold a seat in this body, I may be able to keep my spirit in a teachable posture, and to throw away my errors as fast as honorable gentlemen around me shall convince me of them.

I have risen, Mr. Chairman, to make some remarks on that portion of the President's Message which it was proposed, a few moments since, to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Message endorses, fully and warmly, the conduct of the Administration in the case of Martin Koszta. For my own part, I cannot bestow unqualified praise on that conduct. Scarcely upon Capt. Ingraham can I bestow such praise. It is true, that I honor him for his brave and just determination to rescue Koszta, but I would have had him go a step farther than he did, and insist on Koszta's absolute liberty. I would have him enter into no treaty, and hold no terms with kidnappers. I would have had him leave nothing regarding Koszta's liberty to the discretion of the French Consul or any other Consul; to the discretion of the French Government or any other Government. Koszta was an American subject—a kidnapped American subject—and hence the American Government was bound to set him, immediately and unconditionally free. But Capt. Ingraham represented the American Government. For that occasion he was the American Government.

For saying what I have here said, I may appear very inconsistent in the eyes of many, who know my opposition to all war; for they may regard Capt. Ingraham as having been ready to wage war upon Austria—as having, indeed, actually threatened her with war. But, notwithstanding my opposition to all war, I defend Capt. Ingraham's purpose to use force, should force become necessary. I believe, that such purpose is in harmony with the true office of Civil Government. I hold that an armed national police is proper, and that here was a fit occasion for using it, had moral influences failed. But to believe in this is not to believe in war. It is due to truth to add, that Capt. Ingraham should not be charged with designing war upon Austria. Why should he be thus charged? He had, properly, nothing whatever to do with Austria, nor with the Austrian Consul. There was no occasion for his doing with either of them, nor for his even thinking of either of them. For him to have supposed that Austria, or any of her authorities, could be guilty of kidnapping, would have been to insult her and them. He had to do only with the kidnappers, who were restraining Koszta of his liberty; and all he had to do with these kidnappers was to compel them to an unconditional and immediate surrender of their prey.

I will say, by the way, that I do not condemn the conduct of our Minister, Mr. Marsh, in relation to Koszta, for the good reason that I am not sure what it was. If it was, as it is reported to have been, I trust that both the Administration and the whole country will condemn it.

It is denied in certain quarters, that Koszta was an American subject. But Secretary Marcy has argued triumphantly that, in the light of international law, he was. I regret that he had not proceeded to argue it in other light also. I regret that he had not proceeded to show that even if admitted international law is to the contrary, nevertheless, by the superior law of reason and justice, Koszta was an American subject. I regret that he had not proceeded to publish to the world, that, when a foreigner becomes an inhabitant of this land, abjures allegiance to the Government he has left, and places himself under the protection of ours, the American Government will protect him, and that, too, whether with or without international law, and whether with the world or against the world. In a word, I regret that the Secretary did not declare, that if international law shall not authorize the American Government to protect such a one, then American law shall. It is high time that America should justify herself in such a case by something more certain and authoritative than European codes. It is high time that she should base her justification, in such a case, on the immutable and everlasting principles of reason and justice.

I may be asked, whether I would allow that the subject of a foreign Government, who is alledged to be charged with an offense, and who has fled to our country, can find shelter in his oath of allegiance to our Government? I answer, that I would not allow him to be kidnapped; and that, if his former Government wants him, it must make a respectful call on our Government for his extradition. I add, that I would have our Government the sole judge of the fact whether he is charged with an offense; and also the sole judge whether the offense with which he may be charged is a crime—a real and essential crime for—which he should be surrendered; or a merely conventional and nominal crime, for which he should not be surrendered.

A few words in regard to the charge that Capt. Ingraham invaded the rights of a neutral State. It is to be regretted that the Secretary did not positively and pointedly deny the truth of this charge. I admit that no denial of it was needful to his argument with Mr. Hulsemann. The denial would, however, have been useful. No, Sir; Capt. Ingraham did not violate the rights of Turkey. But, although America cannot be justly charged with violating the rights of Turkey, Turkey, nevertheless, can be justly charged with violating the rights of America. She violated the rights of America, inasmuch as she failed to afford to Koszta the protection which she owed him. If she is not fairly chargeable with permitting him to be kidnapped, she nevertheless is fairly chargeable with permitting him to remain kidnapped, and that is virtually the same thing. To say that Capt. Ingraham violated the rights of Turkey, is nonsense. It is nonsense, if for no other reason than that she had no rights in the case, to be violated. She had none, for the simple reason that she suffered her laws to be silent. The only ground on which a neutral State can claim respect at the hands of belligerents is, that, so far as she is concerned, their rights are protected. If she allows injustice to them, then they may do themselves justice. If she refuses to use the law for them, then they may take it into their own hands. For Turkey to suspend her laws, as she did in the present case, is to leave to herself no ground of wonder or complaint, if a brave Capt. Ingraham supplies her lack of laws.

But I may be asked, whether I would really have had Capt. Ingraham fire into the Austrian ship? I answer, that I would have had him set Koszta free, cost what it might. At the same time I admit, that there would have been blame, had it cost a single life; and that this blame would have rested, not upon the Turks and Austrians only, but upon our own countrymen also. This is so, for the reason that neither our own country nor any other country is so fully identified with justice, in the eyes of all the world, as to make its character for justice an effectual substitute for violence—as to make, in a word, its character for justice its sufficient power to obtain justice. Were our country proverbial, the world over, for wisdom and goodness—were our love to God and man known and read of all men—were every nation to know that, both at home and abroad, our Government acts upon Christian principles—then no nation would wrong us, and no nation would let us be wronged. Then, if one of our people were kidnapped in a foreign land, as was Koszta, the Government of that land would promptly surrender him, at our request. It would pass upon our title to the individual confidingly and generously, rather than jealously and scrutinously. And even if it entertained much doubt of our title, it would nevertheless waive it, under the influence of its conviction that we ask nothing which we do not honestly believe to be our due, and that our character is such as richly to entitle us to all that is possibly our due. Having such a character, our moral force would supercede the application of our physical force. Had physical force been needful to effect the deliverance of Koszta, it would have been needful merely because the American people and American Government lacked the moral character, or, in other words, the moral force, adequate to its deliverance. But, as I have already intimated, our nation is no more deficient in this respect than other nations.

I said that I could not bestow unqualified praise on the Administration, for its part in the Koszta affair. In one or two of those passages of rare rhetorical beauty in his letter to Mr. Hulsemann, Secretary Marcy insinuates the despotic character of Austria. Now, I will not say that there was impudent hypocrisy in the insinuation; but I will say, that the insinuation was in bad taste, and that it was bad policy. A cunning policy would studiously avoid, in our diplomatic correspondence, all allusions to despotism and oppression, lest such allusions might suggest to the reader comparisons between our country and other countries, that would be quite unfavorable to us.

I admit that Austria is an oppressor. But is it not equally true, and far more glaringly true, that America is a much greater and guiltier oppressor? Indeed, compared with our despotism, which classes millions of men, women, and children, with cattle, Austrian despotism is but as the little finger to the loins. Surely, surely, it will never be time for America to taunt Austria with being an oppressor, until the influence of American example is such as to shame Austria out of her oppression, rather than to justify and confirm her in it.

In this same letter to the representative of Austria, Mr. Marcy presumes to quote, as one of the justifications of Capt. Ingraham's conduct, the divine law, to do unto others as we would have others do unto us. Now, was it not the very acme of presumption for the American Government to quote this law, while it surpasses every other Government in trampling it under foot? Did Mr. Marcy suppose Mr. Hulsemann to be stone-blind? Did he suppose that Mr. Hulsemann had lived in the city of Washington so long, and yet had seen nothing of the buying and selling of human beings as brutes, which is continually going on here, under the eye, and under the authority, of Government? Did he suppose, that Mr. Hulsemann could be ignorant of the fact, that the American Government is the great slave-catcher for the American slave-holders? Did he suppose him to be ignorant of the fact, that the great American slave-trade finds in the American Government its great patron; and that this trade is carried on, not only under the general protection, but under the specific regulations of Congress? Did he suppose him to be ignorant of the fact, that many, both at the North and South, (among whom is the President himself,) claim, that American slavery is a national institution?—and made such by the American Constitution? It is a national institution. If not made such by our organic law, it is, nevertheless, made such by the enactments of Congress, the decisions of the Judiciary, and the acquiescence of the American People. And did Mr. Marcy suppose Mr. Hulsemann to be entirely unaware, that the present Administration surpasses all its predecessors in shameless pledges and devotion to the Slave Power? Certainly, Mr. Marcy fell into a great mistake, in presuming Mr. Hulsemann to be in total darkness on all these points. If, indeed, a mistake, it is a very ludicrous one. If but an affectation, it is too wicked to be ludicrous.

I referred, a moment since, to some of the evidences of the nationality of American slavery. It, sometimes, suits the slave-holders to claim that their slavery is an exclusively State concern; and that the North has, therefore, nothing to do with it. But as well may you, when urging a man up-hill with a heavy load upon his back, and with your lash also upon his back, tell him, that he has nothing to do either with the load or the lash. The poor North has much to do with slavery. It staggers under its load and smarts under its lash.

But I must do Secretary Marcy and the Administration justice. What I have said, were I to stop here, would convey the idea, that, in his letter to Mr. Hulsemann, the Secretary inculcates the duty of unconditional obedience to the law, which requires us to do unto others as we would have others do unto us. He is, however, very far from doing so. He remembers, as with paternal solicitude, American slavery and the Fugitive Slave Act, and provides for their safety. To this end he qualifies the commandment of God, and makes it read, that we are to obey it, only when there is no commandment of man to the contrary. In a word, he adopts the American theology—that pro-slavery theology, which makes human Government paramount to the Divine, and exalts the wisdom and authority of man above the wisdom and authority of God.

I said, that I must do the Secretary justice; and I have now done it. But in doing it, a piece of flagrant injustice has been brought to light. For what less than flagrant can I call his injustice to the Bible? The Secretary says, that this blessed volume "enjoins upon all men everywhere, when not acting under legal restraint, to do unto others whatever they would, that others should do unto them." Now, the phrase "when not acting under legal restraint" is a sheer interpolation. The commandment, as we find it in the Bible, is without qualification—is absolute. The Administration is guilty, therefore, through its Secretary, of deliberately corrupting the Bible. Moreover, it is guilty of deliberately corrupting this authentic and sacred record of Christianity at the most vital point. For this commandment to do unto others as we would have others do unto us, is the sum total of the requirements of Christianity. I say so on the authority of Jesus Christ himself. For when He had given this commandment, He added: "For this is the law and the prophets."

I am not unmindful how strong a temptation the Administration was under, in this instance, to corrupt the Bible. I am willing to make all due allowance on that account. Strong, however, as was the temptation, it nevertheless should have been resisted. I am well aware, that for the Administration to justify the rescue of Koszta on the unqualified, naked Bible ground, of doing unto others as we would have others do unto us, would be to throw open the door for the rescue of every fugitive slave. It would be to justify the rescue of Shadrach at Boston. It would be to justify the celebrated rescue in my own neighborhood—I mean the rescue of Jerry at Syracuse. It would be to justify the bloody rescue at Christiana. For, not only is it true, that all men would be rescued from slavery, but it is also true, that very nearly all men would be rescued from slavery, even at the expense of blood. I add, that for the Administration to justify on naked Bible ground the rescue of Koszta, would be, in effect, to justify the deliverance of every slave. Now, for an Administration, that sold itself in advance to the Slave Power, and that is indebted for all its hopes and for its very being to that Power—for such an Administration to take the position of simple Bible truth, and thereby invite the subversion of all slavery, would be to practice the cruelest ingratitude. Such ingratitude could not fail to exasperate the Slave Power—that mighty and dominant Power, before which not only the Administrations of the American People, but the American People themselves, fall down as abjectly as did Nebuchadnezzar's people before the image, which he had set up. Nevertheless, however important it may be to maintain slavery, it is far more important to maintain Christianity; and the Administration is therefore to be condemned for giving up Christianity for slavery. I add, that, if American slavery is, as the famous John Wesley called it, "the sum of all villainies," then it is certainly a very poor bargain to exchange Christianity for it.

Sir, this doctrine of the Administration, that human enactments are paramount to Divine law, and that the Divine authority is not to be allowed to prevail against human authority, is a doctrine as perilous to man as it is dishonorable to God. In denying the supremacy of God, it annihilates the rights of man. I trust, that a better day will come, when all men shall be convinced, that human rights are not to be secured by human cunning and human juggles, but solely by the unfaltering acknowledgment of the Divine power. This crazy world is intent on saving itself by dethroning God. But, in that better day, to which I have referred, the conviction shall be universal, that the only safety of man consists in leaving God upon His throne.

To illustrate the absurdity of this atheistic doctrine of the Administration, we will suppose that, by a statute of Turkey, any person, Hungarian-born, ought to be kidnapped. Then, according to this atheistic doctrine, Capt. Ingraham had no right to rescue Koszta, for his kidnappers, in that case, were acting "under legal restraint."

Mr. SOLLERS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, what is the question before the House?

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. ORR, of South Carolina.) Does the gentleman from Maryland rise to a question of order?

Mr. SOLLERS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. SOLLERS. I want to know what is the subject before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The subject is the reference of the President's Message.

Mr. SOLLERS. The gentleman from New York is making an abolition speech, and I do not see its relevancy to the question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and he is in order.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman from Maryland says that I am making an abolition speech. I am; and I hope he will be patient under it. I, in my turn, will be patient under an anti-abolition speech.

But I will proceed in my illustrations of the absurdity of this atheistic doctrine of the Administration. What, too, if there were a statute of Turkey, declaring it right to kidnap any person who is American-born? Then, according to this corrupt theology of the Administration, we should not be at liberty to rescue an American citizen, who might be kidnapped in Turkey. And what, too, if, acting under human authority, or, in the language of the Administration, "under legal restraint," the people of one of the Barbary States should kidnap Secretary Marcy, and even President Pierce himself—then, also, according to this God-dethroning doctrine of the Administration, our hands would be tied; and we should have no right to reclaim these distinguished men. The supposition, that such distinguished men can be kidnapped, is not absurd. The great Cervantes was a slave in one of the Barbary States. So, too, was the great Arago. And it is not beyond the pale of possibility, that even the great Secretary and the great President may yet be slaves. I am aware that they, who stand up so stoutly for slavery, and for the multiplication of its victims, dream not that they themselves can ever be its victims. They dream not, that this chalice, which they put to the lips of others, can ever be returned to their own. And yet, even this terrible retribution, or one still more terrible than any, which this life can afford, may be the retribution of such stupendous treachery and enmity to the human brotherhood. Little did Napoleon think, when, with perfidy unutterable, he had the noble but ill-fated Toussaint L'Ouverture carried across the waters, to perish in a prison,

> "That he himself, then greatest among men,
> Should, in like manner, be so soon conveyed > Athwart the deep,"*

to perish, also, in a prison.

In that great day (for which, as it has been sublimely said, all other days were made) when every man shall "receive the things done in his body," let me not be found of the number of those who have wielded civil office to bind and multiply the victims of oppression. When I witness the tendency of power in human hands, be it civil or ecclesiastical, or any other power, to such perversion, I shrink from possessing it, lest I, too, might be tempted to lend it to the oppressor instead of the oppressed. "So I returned," says the wise man, "and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun; and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter."

I proceed to say, that this detestable doctrine of the Administration goes to blot all over that page of history, of which Americans are so proud. I mean that page which records the famous achievement of Decatur and his brave companions in the Mediterranean. For it must be remembered, that the Algerine slave-holders, who were so severely chastised, and that, too, notwithstanding, being the most ignorant, they were the least guilty class of slave-holders—I say, it must be remembered, that these Algerine slave-holders acted under human Government, or, in the words of the Administration, "under legal restraint;" and were, therefore, according to the wisdom of the Administration, released from all obligation to do unto others as they would have others do unto them; and were at entire liberty to enslave Americans as well as other people.

I add, that this blasphemous doctrine of the Administration leaves unjustified, and utterly condemns every war, which this nation has waged; for every such war has been against a people acting under the authority of their Government, or, in the language of the Administration, "under legal restraint." What if our enemy, in fighting against us, was guilty of fighting against God—was guilty of trampling under foot the divine law? Nevertheless, according to the sage teachings of the Administration, his guilt was overlaid with innocence, from the fact, that he was "acting under legal restraint." Surely, it will not be pretended that our transgressions of the divine law are excused by our "legal restraint," and that the like transgressions, on the part of others, cannot be excused by the like cause. Surely, if we may put in the plea of "legal restraint" against divine laws, so may others.

Alas, what a disgusting spectacle does the Administration present, in its deliberate corruption of the Bible, for the guilty purpose of sparing so abominable and vile a thing as slavery! Alas, what a pitiable spectacle of self-degradation does this nation present, in choosing such an Administration, and in remaining patient under it! And how rank, and broad, and glaring, is the hypocrisy upon the brow of this nation, who, whilst her feet are planted on the millions she has doomed to the horrors, and agonies, and pollutions of slavery, holds, nevertheless, in one hand, that precious, Heaven-sent volume, which declares that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth;" and in the other, that emphatically American paper, which declares that "all men are created equal!" And how greatly is the guilt of this nation, in her matchless oppressions, aggravated by the fact that she owes infinitely more than ever did any other nation to Christianity, and liberty, and knowledge; and that she is, therefore, under infinitely greater obligation than was ever any other nation, to set an example, blessed in all its influences, both at home and abroad! Other nations began their existence in unfavorable circumstances. They laid their foundations in despotism, and ignorance, and superstition. But Christianity, and liberty, and knowledge, waited upon the birth of this nation, and breathed into it the breath of life.

My hour is nearly up, and I will bring my remarks to a close. After all, the Administration has done us good service, in attempting to qualify the divine command, to do unto others as we would have others do unto us; for, in attempting to do this for the sake of saving slavery, it has, by irresistible implication, admitted, that the command itself requires us to "let the oppressed go free."

The precious law of God contains, as they are wont to insist, ample authority for all the demands of the abolitionists—that despised class of men, to which I am always ready to declare that I belong. Hence, the Administration, in quoting this law as the great rule of conduct between men, has, in no unimportant sense, joined the abolitionists. I say it has quoted this law—this naked law. I say so, not because I forget the words with which it attempted to qualify the law, but because, inasmuch as the law, which God has made absolute, man cannot qualify, these qualifying words fall to the ground, and leave the naked law in all its force. I admit, that the Administration did not quote this law for the sake of manifesting its union with the abolitionists; for, yet a while at least, it expects more advantage from its actual union with the slaveholders than it could expect from any possible union with the abolitionists. No; the Administration quoted this law for the sake of serving a purpose against Austria; and it flattered itself that, by means of a few qualifying words, it could shelter slavery from the force of the quotation. But, in this, it fell into a great mistake. Its greater mistake, however, was in presuming to quote the Bible at all. The Administration should have been aware that the Bible is a holy weapon, and is therefore fitted to anti-slavery, instead of pro-slavery hands. It should have been aware, that it is more dangerous for pro-slavery men to undertake to wield this weapon, than it is for children to play with edge tools. The Bible can never be used in behalf of a bad cause, without detriment to such cause.

I conclude, Mr. Chairman, by expressing the hope, that this egregious blunder of the Administration, in calling the Bible to its help—a blunder, by the way, both as ludicrous and wicked as it is egregious—will, now that the blunder is exposed, be not without its good effect, in the way of admonition. I trust, that this pro-slavery Administration, and, indeed, all pro-slavery parties and pro-slavery persons, will be effectually admonished by this blunder to let the Bible entirely alone, until they shall have some better cause than slavery to serve by it.

THE BIBLE.

The present Lord Bishop of Cashel, Dr. Daley, was conversing with a nobleman on the abounding of certain moral and social evils, and the latter said to the bishop, "What remedy would you propose for them, Mr. Daley?" "The Bible, my lord," replied the bishop. He then enumerated another class of evils; and asked what remedy, and received the same answer—"The Bible." He then mentioned some, which he of course concluded would have some different antidote; but, to his surprise, the bishop still replied, "The Bible, my lord." "Why, Daley," said he, "you are a quack; you have but one remedy for all diseases." "I am so far a quack," said the bishop, "that I do believe the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ to be the only remedy for the moral wretchedness of man, under every possible variety of circumstances."

ONE VACANT CHAIR.

We were talking a few days since with an esteemed friend of ours, who was reared after the good old New England fashion, and with whom "Thanksgiving," as a matter of course, is an institution—a day of family re-union, of domestic and social rejoicing. He is a man of noble sympathies and a big heart. In speaking of the coming Thanksgiving day, a cloud passed over his features, and a tear gathered in his eye. "I have," said he, "for many years gathered my family around me on that day. All my children have sat with me at my annual feast, and it never occurred to me that it could ever be otherwise. We ate, drank, and were merry, without thinking what a change must one day come. But that change has already come. At our annual banquet this year there will be one vacant chair."

It was a sad, sad thought. Sorrowful memories come clustering around the heart at the mention of that "one vacant chair." The pleasant features, the happy smile, the cheerful voice of the loved and the lost come like a vision of sweetness from the sorrowful past. The pale, still face, the marble brow, decked with the garlands of the grave, follow, and the eye dims with tears as the vision vanishes away, and the palpable presence only is left of that "one vacant chair."

And so it is, and so it will be always. Year by year those that we love drop from around us. Some are snatched away by death, going down in the bloom of their beauty to the city of the dead. Some swing out into the great world, and are borne by the currents of life, far away from us. The day of annual re-union comes; we gather round the yearly banquet, we look for the cherished faces, we listen for the loved voices; but the heart swells and the big tear trembles on the eyelids, for there, where one who nestled fondliest in our affections used to sit, is "one vacant chair."

We who sit at the head of these family feasts should never forget that one day we shall be absent from the banquet. The time will surely come when we shall cease to occupy a place there. We know not when the vacancy may occur, but as surely as time rolls on, as surely as human destiny is sweeping onward, and onward, always towards eternity, so surely will the day of our departure come; and struggle as we may, resist as we may, as all the aggregated energies of nature may, we must pass from among the living, and leave behind us for the next gathering "one vacant chair." THE NEGLECTED CHILD.

I never was a favorite—
My mother never smiled
On me, with half the tenderness
That blessed her fairer child.
I've seen her kiss my sister's cheek,
While fondled on her knee;
I've turned away to hide my tears—
There was no kiss for me.

And yet I strove to please with all
My little store of sense;
I strove to please—and infancy
Can rearly give offense.
But when my artless efforts met
A cold, ungentle check,
I did not dare to throw myself
In tears upon her neck.

How blessed are the beautiful!
Love watches o'er their birth;
Oh beauty! in my nursery
I learned to know thy worth;
For even there I often felt
Forsaken and forlorn,
And wished—for others wished it too—
I never had been born!

I'm sure I was affectionate;
But, in my sister's face,
There was a look of love that claimed
A smile or an embrace.
But when I raised my lips, to meet
The pressure children prize,
None knew the feelings in my heart—
They spake not in my eyes.

But oh! that heart too keenly felt
The anguish of neglect;
I saw my sister's lovely form
With gems and roses decked;
I did not covet them, but oft,
When wantonly reproved,
I envied her the privilege
Of being so beloved.

But soon a time of triumph came—
A time of sorrow too—
For sickness o'er my sister's form
Her venom'd mantle threw:
The features once so beautiful
Now wore the hue of death,
And former friends shrank fearfully
From her infectious breath.

'Twas then, unwearied, day and night,
I watched beside her bed,
And fearlessly upon my breast
I pillowed her poor head.
She lived!—she loved me for my care!—
My grief was at an end;
I was a lonely being once,
But now I HAVE a friend.

THE MILLER'S BOY AND HIS BIBLE.

"The entrance of Thy Word giveth light."

The following record of one of the happy results of Bible distribution in Sweden, appeared in the "Presbyterian" about four years since. The incident is as interesting now as when it was first related.

I returned, says a Swedish colporteur, through a village where there are several water mills. A Bible had been purchased from me there, three years since, by a miller's boy, who, not long before, had fallen into the water, and had narrowly escaped being crushed by the mill wheel. Snatched wonderfully from death, John, this miller lad, had at that time begun to be concerned about the salvation of his soul. Hence the purchase which me made of a Bible. He read that sacred book, and was fervent in prayers. The Lord heard his prayers, and he became a staunch confessor of the truth as it is in Jesus. He was not long in becoming the object of persecutions from the miller, the miller's wife, his comrades, and persons who frequented the mill. All were determined to render it impossible for him to read the Bible; but the Lord watched over him. Shortly afterward, Andrew, the miller's son, a young man of twenty years of age, a victim to habits of impiety and dissipation, became likewise a disciple of the Saviour. This happened in the following manner:

John was Andrew's assistant at the mill. Originally, they were the best friends in the world; but since John's conversion, Andrew employed all sorts of suggestions, artifices, threatenings, and even violence, to plunge his comrade into a disorderly life. All his efforts were ineffectual. One day, while John was busy out of doors, Andrew, who was alone in the mill, took John's Bible for the purpose of casting it into the river; however, just as he was about to throw it in, he opened the Bible mechanically, and this passage caught his eye, "Two shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left:"—Matt. 24: 41. This declaration struck his conscience with the rapidity of lightning; it took possession of his heart; and under the weight of an inexpressible emotion, he placed the Bible again in John's chamber. Dating from that moment, Andrew became a new man; thereafter he showed himself to be a sincere servant of Jesus Christ. United from that time in heart and soul with one another, John and Andrew, young as they were, soon became, in the hand of God, instruments of a religious awakening in the village and the surrounding neighborhood.

GIBBON'S LATER RELIGIOUS VIEWS.—Among the papers of the aunt of the historian, were found, after her decease, several letters to her from her nephew, Edward Gibbon, the historian, and his friend Lord Sheffield, from which it would appear that the religious views of the former had, at least from the year 1789, undergone considerable change. From one of these interesting letters, shortly to be published, I have been permitted to make the following extract:—"Whatever you may have been told of my opinions, I can assure you with truth, that I consider religion as the best guide of youth, and the best support of old age; that I firmly believe there is less real happiness in the business and pleasure of the world, than in the life which you have chosen, of devotion and retirement."

Dean Swift was one of the smoothest and most harmonious versifiers of the language; and yet he wrote to a lady—"Madam, I know nothing of music. I would not give a farthing for all the music in the universe."

ISRAEL'S UNBELIEF.

Why do not the Jews receive the Gospel of Christ? That they should have stood out in their opposition for so many centuries, notwithstanding the palpable evidence that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah of their own Scriptures, has been the astonishment of many minds. The unkindness which they have experienced at the hands of Christians will not explain it. The inconsistencies of believers, in points of doctrine, will not clear up the mystery. These things have undoubtedly helped to confirm the opposition of the Jews, but for the true ground of their hatred we must look still deeper.

In every age, and in every nation, as well as under every variety of circumstances, their opposition has been characterized by the same spirit of bitterness, which they manifested when the gospel was first declared to them. The unkindness of Christ's disciples could not have been alledged then as the reason, nor could the inconsistencies of believers have been the ground upon which the Jews then based their opposition to the Saviour. The first preachers were of their own nation, and were actuated by the most tender impulses in attempting to show them the way of life. Yet the Jews were as violent in their opposition then as they are now. And those who, overlooking the real ground of it, have undertaken to approach them in ways which were seemingly calculated to disarm them of prejudices, thinking to have more success than others whose methods of labor had been more objectionable, have only returned convinced that the veil was still upon their heart, and kept there by a power which mere human skill could not overcome.

Whatever difficulty the Jews may have found in the doctrinal errors of Christians, we seriously doubt whether their rejection of the gospel has been, in any considerable degree, owing to them. Had errors of faith and practice never obtained among the Jews themselves, the discovery of them among Christians would doubtless have proved an insuperable difficulty. But at the time Christianity was introduced, the Jews were cut up into numerous sects, some of them varying as widely from the Law of Moses as the sects of Christendom now do from the Christianity of the New Testament. If they could still rest in the persuasion "that God spake unto Moses," notwithstanding his disciples had become divided among themselves, it was not very difficult, surely, to allow that God might have spoken to Jesus, although his disciples had fallen into errors.

We do not mean to intimate, that the errors of Christians are of no sort of consequence in this case. Certainly, the more completely Christians are covered with the armor of truth, the greater will be their advantage in the controversy, other things being equal. And we have ever thought, that the error of Christians in regard to the Sabbath, to say nothing of any thing else, was a serious embarrassment to their efforts in behalf of a people who look upon this institution as an important part of the Divine Law.

But the real stumbling block to the Jew is the doctrine of Christ crucified. Every other ground of objection to the gospel is trifling in comparison with this. This was the offense when the gospel was first offered, and this is the offense still. See 1 Cor. 1 : 23, Rom. 9 : 32, Luke 2 : 34, John 6 : 60, 66, 1 Pet. 2 : 8, Isa. 8 : 14.

But why is this doctrine so hateful to the Jew? Alas! it is hated by every unrenewed person; there is nothing in it which pleases the carnal mind. And such is the opposition which unrenewed men feel to it, that not one would ever embrace it, and be saved, were it not that God, who is rich in mercy, brings him to it by the efficacious influences of his Holy Spirit. In this respect Jew and Gentile stand on the same footing. But the Jew's opposition is characterized by greater malignity than that of the Gentile; the solution of which seems to lie in the principle, that the more men have rested in a conceit of their own righteousness, the greater is their hatred of a scheme of salvation which gives a death-blow to such hopes. Even among Gentiles, the most hopeless case upon which to try the converting power of the gospel is the self-conceited moralist. Now the Jews have always rested in a persuasion of their ability to justify themselves by the deeds of the law. For this purpose they suppose the law was given to them. In the sacrifices of the Levitical service they were never able to see any typical reference to a greater and more perfect sacrifice to be offered by the Messiah. (2 Cor. 3 : 13.) Hence the doctrine of Christianity, that all those sacrifices have received their accomplishment, and are of no use in the way of justifying the offerers of them, is the grand stumbling block, which nothing short of the power of God will cause them to overcome.

Dedication of a Meeting-House.—The brethren of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at South Kingston, R. I., have succeeded in building them a place of worship, capable of seating about two hundred people. It is built after a plain but neat style, with free slips and no gallery. The house was dedicated to the worship of God on the 4th inst. Sermon by Eld. Charles M. Lewis.

TIDINGS FROM CHINA.

[On the 15th inst., we received letters from our missionary brethren at Shanghae, China, dated Nov. 1, 1853. The account which they furnish of military operations during the previous month, is later and more complete than has reached us through any other channel. Knowing the deep interest felt in these details, we think it better to print them at once, than to delay them till after the next meeting of the Missionary Board.]

From Bro. Wardner.

Brother Carpenter has probably given you an account of what he has witnessed of the besieging of Shanghae up to the date of his last, and it may be not uninteresting to you to know what has been done on this side of the city.

On the morning of Sept. 29th, I went to the banks of the Whampoa, about a mile and a half distant, to see the imperial fleet of about 80 junks pass down the river. They kept up a constant fire, thinking, perhaps, thus to frighten the rebels out of the city, and give them peaceable possession. Their guns, I supposed, were charged only with powder, as there was no enemy near. But as I was returning, and about half way home, a cannon ball came whizzing by, and struck but a short distance beyond me. Another fleet, nearly as large, was at the same time coming down the Soo-Chou river, which intersects the Whampoa on the north-east boundary of the English reservation. On the same day all the city gates were closed but two. In the afternoon, Mrs. W. and children went to stop with a friend in the foreign community till we saw what turn matters were going to take.

On the morning of the 30th, I went to assist Bro. C. and family out of the city, but found they had left the night before.

Oct 1st—Sabbath. A brisk engagement commenced at the north gate at daybreak, lasting till 7 o'clock. At 7 o'clock an attack was made at the west gate (about a third of a mile from our house, and in sight,) and continued till half past eight. At half past nine, a cannonading commenced from the river, and at the time a body of four or five hundred men passed our house, moving without any kind of order, all yelling at the top of their voices, and immediately commenced firing towards the city. They drew up in battle order about midway between our house and the wall, and kept up their fire until eleven o'clock, which was promptly returned. Finally, one of their officers having received a wound in his leg, they retreated in greater confusion than they advanced, and stationed themselves on the bank across the canal just before our door, when the enemy opened their cannons upon them. At length a ball came and struck right in their midst, when they very promptly sounded a retreat, and gave out that they were going to their dinners. Their dastardly conduct was most disgusting, after witnessing the bombastic manner in which they advanced. By one o'clock all firing had ceased. About forty are thought to have been killed and wounded at the North gate, and nearly that number at the West gate. The whole imperial force is said to number about 15,000, and the rebels 6,000. After the battles were over, quite a large block of buildings were burnt outside the West gate, in and behind which the imperialists had concealed themselves during the battle.

2d. Mrs. W. returned home.

5th. A battle commenced at the West gate at day-break, lasting about an hour, and then a cannonading commenced on the river, and lasted till eleven o'clock, during which time one of the imperialist junks blew up and set fire to another, destroying twenty or thirty lives.

6th. Had our house and effects prized, with the hope of getting indemnification in case it is plundered or burned by the Chinese.

7th. The insurgents burnt about 200 buildings outside the little South gate, and have since burnt about as many more. Many have also been burnt and torn down at the North and East gates.

8th—Sabbath. Preached at Sa-whay-jaw to 30 or 40 hearers. As they could take no interest in any subject foreign to their present distress, I took that for my theme, arguing that these calamities had come upon them because of their national and individual wickedness, idolatry, and rejection of the gospel, illustrating by history and scripture examples, and exhorted them, as the only means of escaping like calamities, and the death that never dies, to cast away their wooden gods, which had proved unable to protect them, and repent and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, who is able and willing to save.

Our regular missionary operations are pretty much broken up. Still I have opportunities almost daily of scattering a little seed here and there by the wayside, and find the people all ears, provided what is said has a connection with their present distress.

9th. Another battle at the West gate. It is difficult to ascertain with much certainty the number killed and wounded in these battles, as Chinese reports are apt to vary according to their politics.

10th. There being no battle, I was absent from home part of the day on business, during which time three imperial soldiers came into the neighborhood, caught and robbed several men, stole poultry, clothes, &c., and attempted to take a buffalo belonging to our milkman, as he was leading her here to milk. But he, affirming that she was mine, was allowed to pass. When I returned home, he came and plead hard for me to write a certificate affirming that the buffalo belonged to me, as a sort of protection. Chinese morality! As he was returning from the foreign settlement this morning, where he had been to sell milk, and was bringing a few pounds of beef from the butcher's for us, he said he was attacked by a band of soldiers, who threatened to take off his head if he refused to give it up. But he declared himself to be my servant, and, to prove it, presented a note Bro. C. had sent by him to me, and therefore was allowed to pass without further molestation. I mention these things to show what influence the mere name of a foreigner has with the Chinese.

11th. More robbing in the neighborhood. Rev. Mr. McClatchie sailed for England with his family, last week, in a very feeble state of health.

13th. About 500 imperialists attacked the city again opposite our house, and continued about twenty minutes, losing one man. On retreating, they broke into the house of one of our near neighbors, and dragged him and another man to their encampment, whence they made their escape unhurt. They also attempted to burn a poor man's boat, which lay in the canal just outside our gate. Seeing the smoke, I went out and saw they had filled it with straw and got it well agoing, while a soldier stood by it with a spear fighting the owner away, who was crying piteously, as it was, very likely, his chief means of support. Seeing me, the soldier stepped back and allowed the man to extinguish the flames. There were ten or twelve in all, and one or two under officers, engaged in this base manœuvre. As I approached they began to apologize for their conduct by pretending that the man had come to carry off plunder from the city, but acknowledged that they had no positive evidence that he had any such motive. They took my reproofs very meekly, and after scolding at the man a little, very politely bid me good day and passed on. While this was going on, two cannon balls and one musket ball, fired from the wall, probably at these men, entered the house of our nearest neighbor, not five rods from where I stood.

13th. About 1000 came at day-break, and made an attack in front of our house again. After fighting about 15 minutes, one man being wounded, they all fled in great disorder, and came skulking round behind our house and the neighbors' houses, fences, &c. But the officers pursued them with their sleeves rolled up, and drove them back at the point of their swords, and kept them fighting till 9 o'clock; during which time we saw five carried off the field, three of whom appeared to be dead. There may have been many more whom we did not see. In their retreat they seemed determined to strip the neighborhood of every thing they could lay their hands on. Our neighbors came running to me, begging most earnestly that I would go out and save their property. Though my will was good enough to do what I could by entreaty, yet I thought it not prudent to leave my own premises, especially as I was strictly cautioned the day before by Mr. Marshall, through Bro. Carpenter, against doing so, as he thought it would be not only hazarding my life, but the interests of American citizens generally, and I should forfeit my protection if I did.

14th. Another battle before our house, which lasted from daylight till 7 o'clock. There was more plundering done to-day than usual. Some of the soldiers were prowling round nearly all day. Near noon, about half a dozen, armed with spears and guns, came and demanded entrance into our yard. The gate not being opened to them, they attempted to climb over; when I was informed of what was going on. Putting on my hat, I walked out deliberately and barred the door against them. They stepped back and looked at me for a moment, and then retired.

15th—Sabbath. Learned that the Commander-in-Chief of the imperial forces here is to lose his head if he does not take the city within three days. A messenger whom I sent with a note to Bro. Carpenter yesterday, not returning, I went this morning in search of him; and on my return found the neighborhood in arms, carrying hoes and lug-poles and various other farming utensils, and was told that a body of about twenty soldiers had been round, had caught and robbed two men, and were dragging them off, when the people rallied in self-defense. The soldiers, after firing several harmless shots, and threatening vengeance, retired. The rebels from the city wall watched the proceedings with much apparent interest, and as soon as the robbers got separated from the people, opened their fire upon them; and, to wind up, saluted the people by burning a quantity of gunpowder, producing a dense cloud of smoke. The people seem to be fast changing their politics, and seem anxious for Ta-ping-wong's army to come and put an end to this matter. Communication between us and the foreign community is now pretty much cut off, except as I pass back and forth myself.

16th. Mrs. W. and children went again to spend a few days with Mrs. Hall, who, fearing for their safety, had sent several urgent invitations. Last night the robbers came, according to their threats of yesterday, and attempted to set fire to some houses in the neighborhood; but the people rose against and repelled them. At 10 o'clock this morning another party came, and were also driven away. About noon, fifty or sixty came, when there was a general rally from all directions. The excitement continued about an hour, during which time fourteen or fifteen guns were fired by the robbers, but did no harm.

18th. Moved most of our furniture and clothing into a couple of rooms which were offered us in Dr. Boon's house at Hong-Ku. Mrs. W. and the children stay there, where I hire them boarded at $15 per month. But I remain at home for the most part, to prevent our house and premises from being pillaged. This is the first opportunity I have had to get my family in safe quarters without living on others, though I and Bro. C. have made diligent inquiry—every corner being filled.

20th. Another battle in front of our house, lasting from daylight till 1 o'clock. In the night, it is said, the rebels went out and surprised the enemy in their camp and killed two or three hundred of them, and took two of their junks on the river.

22d—Sabbath. Heard that twenty or thirty imperialists, by some means, got into the North gate last night, and were all beheaded.

23d. A battle at the West gate, in which it is said fifty of the imperialists were killed, and several of the rebels. On the night following, another battle was fought there.

24th. Returning from Hong-Ku about 8 o'clock this morning, I found an army of a thousand or more by my house, through which I had to pass. They had fifteen scaling ladders and other apparatus for climbing the wall. About every tenth man carried a banner, and about ninety-nine hundredths of the remainder were armed with swords, knives, spears, and spikes—or rather, bamboo poles with large nails tied on one end—and the rest carried small fire-locks about three feet long. Thus equipped, they had come out to take the city. Here they stood, sat, smoked their pipes, discussed military tactics, and retired. And if Pekin stands long enough, we may in the December number of the Gazette see the notice of a sanguinary battle fought on the 24th of October, on the West of the city of Shanghae, during which the wall was scaled, thousands of the rebels slain, and a large quantity of ammunition and implements of war taken.

26th. Learn that three men in the city, having been detected in selling rice at fifty cash per catty, contrary to the orders of the insurgent chief, were cut open and their hearts taken out. There was a battle at the little South gate to-day, in which several were killed and wounded. A detachment of Ta-ping-wong's army is expected here very soon.

27th. Another battle was fought at the West gate between midnight and daylight this morning, and there has been fighting on the East and South sides of the city nearly all day. Another ship belonging to the imperialists is said to have been blown up to-day. The loss of life is unknown.

30th. Robbers have again been committing depredations in our neighborhood to-day, burnt down twelve or fifteen houses, killed one man, and severely wounded another, slightly wounded one woman, and carried off two others. There was great excitement for a time. The neighboring women and children came by the dozen into my enclosure for shelter. I have given out word, that the women and children can find shelter in my house as long as it may afford them any protection, but refuse them the privilege of bringing any thing with them except beds to sleep on, and a little wearing apparel, as making my premises a deposit for their property would not only greatly hazard my own, but also the safety of all who may take shelter here. It is truly painful to see these poor harmless people thus devoured alive. But such are the necessary accompaniments of war. When will the time come, that men shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and learn war no more? But we are told the Lord will overturn, overturn, and overturn, till He shall come whose right it is, and shall possess the kingdom. And may He hasten it in his time.

Thus far our lives have been graciously preserved, though in constant jeopardy. A few days since, I fell short only two or three seconds of standing in the course of a bullet which whistled by my face; but for some wise purpose it was so ordered. May it not be in vain that I am thus spared. Pray for us.

As ever, yours in Christ, N. Wardner.

From Bro. Carpenter.

Shanghae, Nov. 1, 1853.

As Bro. Wardner has left some white paper, and allows me to mark on it, I will do so by giving you an account of my excursion, or rather incursion, into the city day before yesterday. We used to speak of excursions to the hills, to Lee-oo, Ming-hong, See-chu &c., as something of a treat in this secluded country. But now an incursion into the city where we have resided six years, is regarded as quite remarkable. As in western nations in time of war, so here, it seems to be the policy of both parties to cut off all communication, except that which is without suspicion. Foreigners have occasionally got admittance on urgent business, but latterly, since the chief sent to the various consuls his complaint against our American officials for violating good faith and assisting the other party, the lines have been drawn closer than ever. But we left most of our winter clothing in the city, and seeing no prospect of a speedy termination of the war, we began to be anxious to secure it if practicable. So, having prepared a letter to the rebel chief, making a plain statement of the case, two days ago I took it, and, with my teacher, went to the Little East Gate, (the only one open at all in these times,) where I found that a brisk trade was carried on between the insurgents and others on the wall, and the people outside, in such articles as rice, pork, fish, and vegetables. In fixing the price of the various articles, the country people seemed to enjoy their usual freedom of speech, while the elevation of their voices corresponded very well with the hight of those above them. Altogether, it was a busy, noisy scene, and any thing but disagreeable to see these comforts going where I was sure they were needed. The articles were taken into the city by ropes let down from the wall, which on the outside is about twenty feet high. After a little, I caught the eye of one of the officers, who seemed to recognize me, and immediately got a new rope and let down, to which I fastened my letter. Informing him that I would wait for an answer, he disappeared with it. In about twenty minutes he returned with permission obtained at head quarters for me to enter. While I was waiting for the gate to be opened, a poor man besought me most piteously to befriend him, and assist him to get into the city to his destitute family, whom he had not seen for about a month. He called over the name of Budha, as the most sacred one he knew of, and was disposed to bow down to me also. What rendered his petition the more painful, was the fact that I could render him no effectual assistance. I had requested only entrance for myself and teacher, and no third man could accompany us. On entering, I saw but very few people in the streets, and the greater part of these had sorrow depicted upon their countenances, while some, in attempting to get up a forced smile, only revealed the more unmistakably the permanent ill-concealed grief of the inner man. One month had elapsed, and they could see no prospect of deliverance. But up to the present there has been a sufficient supply of provisions to prevent distress to those who have money. The host of beggars that used to be there had either managed to get out, or many of them must have died, or else they are congregated somewhere, as I saw but few.

When I rang my door bell Le-Chong came and opened the door as readily as though I had only been out for a night and returned, and he was not a little cheered at seeing us. Nothing had transpired to molest him during the month he had been there. A few acquaintances had called to see him—among others our head carpenter, who also is acting as watchman at the house of a wealthy man in the city. The pleasure of Le-Chong, excited by our presence, and the prospect of a release from his confinement, was soon displaced with other thoughts. It was necessary to bring to his ears the sad news that his wife had become quite blind in both eyes, and that this was one of the main causes of my particular anxiety to relieve him, so that he might return to his home. I do not yet know whether this blindness is to be permanent or not. Having got together the things I wished, we found no difficulty in getting out.

Outside, there seemed to be some prospect of a crisis in the affairs of the Imperialists and foreigners. In the present state of things, the latter will not pay the customs demanded by the former, who have made strenuous exertions to get their custom-house back; and within the last few days two foreigners have been fired at by the Imperialists.

Yours as ever, S. Carpenter.

OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

The Committee on Outfit have received a letter from Boston, informing them that a vessel will sail from that port in about ten days time; and Bro. Saunders has been directed to visit Boston, and ascertain whether the accommodations are suitable; and if so, and the terms are reasonable, to secure a pasage.

A missionary meeting has been invited by the brethren of Westerly, and will probably be held at the meeting-house of the Pawcatuck Church, when exercises may be expected suited to the occasion of our missionaries' anticipated departure. The time of the meeting will be fixed as soon as circumstances will permit.

The following is a letter from C. A. Minor, in regard to Dr. Barclay and the war.

Philadelphia, Jan. 11, 1854.

I notice that it is stated in the Recorder that Dr. Barclay has signified to his friends that the troubles in the East will render his removal advisable, and that his friends have authorized him to return home, &c. I received similar information from a friend in Virginia several weeks since. But on making inquiry of the Society, and of his friends who are in direct correspondence with him, I found that there is no probability of his leaving Palestine. I have obtained his private letters, and have read nearly all that the doctor has written. He even seems more deeply interested in his field of labor than formerly, and entertains strong hopes of witnessing the most favorable result.

The report which is published in the Recorder arose from the fact that the Society which sustains Dr. Barclay, as early as last spring, sent him instructions, that in case the then threatening war with Russia should lead to hostile operations in Palestine, and thereby endanger his life, he should not hesitate to remove, and designated Malta as the best Asylum during the prevalence of the war. I have this statement from a leading member of their Miss. Board, (Elder Burnett,) who is now in Philadelphia. He says that instead of abandoning the field, they are even now proposing to send out another Missionary to aid Dr. Barclay. He is also convinced that the agricultural plan of operation is not only feasible, but that it presents the only practicable method of operating in Palestine.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Having noticed a paragraph in the Recorder, giving an impression that the mission to Palestine will be exposed to unusual danger from the existing war between Russia and Turkey, I am impelled to write a few words in reference to the matter.

If any of our friends, who feel at all alarmed at the suggestion that a missionary should be in danger of life or limb in the pursuit of his "calling," are not quieted by a reference to the Chart of Life, I advise them to take a map of the Ottoman Empire, and study the position of the antagonistic armies. They will find that the war, before it can have reached the fields of Palestine, must have traversed the whole extent of the Turkish Empire, and that Constantinople itself must be captured by the Russians. But this event must, beyond all contingency, conclude the war, as the Sublime Porte would not of course yield its capital until it was thoroughly conquered, and its armies annihilated. So that, even supposing the worst, that the Turks are defeated, (which even we do not believe,) peace will be restored long before a Russian army could encamp on the sacred plains. The only additional danger to which the war subjects our missionaries, is that arising from the loosened restraints of government, always consequent on a state of war; and if our missionaries are too valuable or too weak to be trusted to those changes, it may be as well to send them where there is no danger to be encountered and no work to be done.

Yours respectfully, W. J. S.

A Chance for the Benevolent.—The N. Y. Tribune has received from D. W. Kilbourne, Esq., of Keokuk, Iowa, a lengthy communication in relation to the emancipation of nineteen slaves. It is to this effect:—That in October last a maiden lady, named Frances Gordon, arrived at Keokuk from near Springfield, Ky., accompanied by nineteen slaves belonging to her, whom she wished to and in a short time did emancipate. Mr. K. gives a detailed account of the difficulties she experienced in removing from Kentucky. Among other devices employed to prevent her removal, and the freeing of the blacks, it is stated that her brother, a Baptist preacher, instituted proceedings against her in the Circuit Court, on the ground that she was imbecile—she being 80 years of age. Afterward another suit was brought to prevent her taking her slaves out of the State, charging that she had only a life-lease of them. But she succeeded in the Courts, and finally contrived to escape from the State, taking refuge in Iowa. In so doing, however, she consumed her fortune, at no time large, and is dependent upon her emancipated slaves for support. She is now anxious to purchase the freedom of a son of one of her late slaves, and also the husbands of two of them, who are still in bondage in Kentucky, for which purpose some $3,000 will be required.

Revival in a Penitentiary.—For some time past (says a Cincinnati paper) the keeper of the Kentucky State Prison has been in the habit of lecturing the inmates every Sunday morning. Several of the prisoners gave such evidence of concern on the subject of religion as induced the keeper to write to the Rev. J. D. Black, of Scott County, and other ministers, to visit the prison, on the third Sunday of December. Mr. B. arrived on Saturday evening, and on Sunday morning repaired to the prison chapel, a room about forty by sixty feet. At the hour of 11 they met again, and after the preaching of a short discourse, an opportunity was given for those that wished, to designate themselves as seekers after religion. Several came up and made a public profession of their faith, while many were discovered weeping in the congregation. That same afternoon, at 3 o'clock, seven persons were baptized in a pool within the prison walls. The circumstances attendant upon this revival are rather extraordinary.

Tobacco among Christians.—At a late Convention of Baptists in New Brunswick, a committee was appointed to report on Tobacco, who, according to the Christian Visitor, brought in the following:—

"Your Committee on Tobacco are grieved to learn that the use of this luxury, falsely so called, is increasing in the Province to an alarming extent. The church of God, we fear, is deeply implicated in this evil. The use of this poisonous weed is regarded by competent judges as injurious, and only so, in its physical, moral, and religious influence upon man; as such it ought to be abandoned. We would most respectfully call upon our ministers and church members seriously to examine the subject, in the light of social and religious obligation, and to set such an example in relation to it as shall be worthy of imitation by old and young."

Decline of Methodism in New York.—The Christian Advocate and Journal gives a table showing the total number of members of the Methodist Churches in this City to have been, in 1843, 9,780; in 1845, 9,571; 1847, 9,326; 1849, 8,893; 1851, 9,289; 1853, 9,319—showing a decrease in ten years of 400 members, while the population has nearly doubled.

Grande Ligne Mission.—The Semeur Canadien of the 16th ult., reports the baptism of eight converts from Popery at this station during the previous week. These, added to the converts already received in the churches during the summer, make about forty who have abandoned the Romish church this year, and have publicly professed their faith in Christ, in connection with the Grande Ligne Mission.

The Trainer Family.—This family are now all free, reünited, and living in New York. The little girl Jane, it will be remembered, was set free by a New York Court; the mother was purchased from the man who held her as a slave; the father was a free negro when the case was first brought to public notice. A meeting was held in New York, on Sunday evening, Jan. 8th, to congratulate the family on their happy advent from slavery. At that meeting, after appropriate religious exercises, Lewis Tappan gave a complete history of the case, an address was delivered by Rev. Dr. Pennington, and a collection was taken for the benefit of the family.

Another Methodist Property Case has recently been decided in England, relative to the control of the meeting-houses. Many of the trustees of meeting-houses being Reformers, have refused the use of their houses to the preachers of the Conference. The courts, however, have decided that, according to the deeds of the houses, their use is secured to preachers sent by the Conference.

SECOND-DAY, JAN 9.

In the SENATE, Mr. Chase presented a memorial from the State of Ohio, relative to the riotous proceedings of the citizens of Erie, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices. Mr. Badger introduced a bill granting a limited credit on railroad duties. Mr. Foot offered a resolution, which was adopted, inquiring into the cause of the detention of the United States mails between the cities of New York and Washington. Mr. Benjamin offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling for the diplomatic correspondence relative to the Tehuantepec right of way.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES was not in Session.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 10.

In the SENATE, the resolutions relative to alterations in the Capitol buildings, and the expenditures and appropriations for the improvement of Western Harbors, were adopted. A message was then received from the House, announcing the death of the Hon. H. A. Muhlenberg, late Representative from Pennsylvania. After a few appropriate remarks by Mr. Brodhead, and the passage of the usual resolutions of condolence, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Drum, of Pennsylvania, announced the death of his late colleague, Mr. Muhlenberg, and offered the customary resolutions. The House then adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 11.

In the SENATE, after the reading of the Journal, the correspondence concerning the Clayton and Bulwer Treaty, respecting Central American affairs, was taken up. Mr. Cass having the floor, defended at great length his speech delivered last spring upon this subject, contending that the protocol executed by the negotiators vitiated the treaty, and gave Great Britain an excuse for evading it.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES resumed the consideration of the resolutions from the Senate, voting the thanks of Congress and a sword to Capt. Ingraham for his heroic services, and after a lengthy debate the resolutions were passed by a vote of 174 to 9.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 12.

In the SENATE, Mr. Weller gave notice of a bill to establish a semi-monthly mail between the Atlantic and Pacific via Nicaragua. Mr. Bell introduced a resolution of inquiry relative to imprisonment of American seamen on the Coast of Chili, which was adopted. The House resolution, tendering the thanks of Congress and a sword to Capt. Ingraham, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Mr. Chase presented a petition praying for the abolition and prohibition of Slavery in all the Territories of the United States. The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Clayton and Bulwer Treaty respecting Central American affairs. Mr. Clayton having the floor, proceeded to reply at length to the speech made by Mr. Cass yesterday.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES spent the whole day in talking about printing the Census, and about the mode of paying Congressmen.

European News.

Of the European news received since our last, the following summary embraces every important item.

Lord Palmerston has returned to office, upon conditions not made public.

From the Turkish War there is nothing of importance, except the report of a Russian victory in Asia. Turkey has agreed to send a representative to the new peace conference. The allied fleets have entered the Black Sea, but not to make war on Russia. Their purpose is said to be simply to prevent a recurrence of such an affair as that at Sinope.

Odessa letters of Dec. 8th, state positively, that the Jagondib, Russian 90-gun ship, was destroyed at the Battle of Sinope. The ship was bravely attacked by a Turkish frigate, and both vessels blew up. One of the Turkish admiral's aides-de-camp had died of his wounds at Sevastopol. The Admiral, Osman Pasha, has himself had a limb amputated, and now lies in a dangerous state. The Turks themselves estimate the loss they sustained at Sinope, in ships, munitions and treasure, at 20 millions of piastres.

The overland Indian mail brings confirmation that the Shah of Persia had left Teheran with an army numbering 30,000 cavalry, with 1,000 pieces of cannon, and 3,000 camel loads of ammunition, to co-operate with Russia. At latest accounts, the army had passed Tabreez. The Shah had also sent an envoy to Dost Mahommed to point out the advantages of his siding with Persia and the Russians.

According to the Kölnische Zeitung, curious developments are coming to light, which indicate that Russia has long been preparing for the present crisis. A large expedition has been secretly organizing, under pretense of a campaign against the Khan of Khiva. For fifteen years past, Russian agents have been busied in organizing the Mongolian and Kirgesian hordes, supplying them with money and arms, and teaching them to act in concert. From this source it is asserted that Russia may obtain the aid of 200,000 irregulars, mostly horsemen, so that if war does break out in earnest between Russia and the Western powers, the war will rage along the entire line of Europe and Asia.

Shanghae dates to Nov. 2d represent that fighting was going on with little result on either side. The Imperialists numbered about 14,000, and the foreign vessels hitherto employed at Chin-kiang-foo had been brought round to assist them. The fleet of junks was also coming, and unless the insurgents receive reënforcements, it is doubtful if they will be able to hold the city.

THE ANTI-RENT DIFFICULTIES.—The Court of Appeals, on Saturday, Dec. 31, announced their decision in the suit brought by the Attorney-General, in behalf of the State, to test the title to the manor of Rensselaerwyck. The Court reversed the decision of Judge Harris, and unanimously declared the title produced and proved by the Van Rensselaers to be regular and valid. The largest portion of the manor in the County of Albany, including the entire towns of Knox, Berne, Rensselaerville and Waterloo, has lately been purchased by Walter S. Church, Esq., of Angelica, and Oscar Tyler, Esq., of Albany; and Mr. Church has also purchased a large portion of the manor in Rensselaer County. These gentlemen offer to release the rents and quarter sales for a sum in gross of which the interest at 6 per cent. will equal the value of the rent, estimating wheat at one dollar a bushel, (the average price for the last twenty years being ten shillings,) and the four fat fowls and a day's service with a team at $2 50, which is less than their average value. Thus the fee simple of a farm of 160 acres, drawing an annual rent averaging $30 62, can be purchased for $416 66, or $2 60 an acre.

The Steamship San Francisco—Awful Disaster.

The new steamship San Francisco sailed from New York for San Francisco on the 21st of December. She was chartered by Government, and had on board, besides her officers and a large crew, companies A, B, D, G, H, I, K, and L, of the third regiment of the United States Artillery. These companies, with the non-commissioned staff and band of the regiment, constituted a force of over five hundred men.

On the 6th of January, a ship arrived at a Nova Scotia port, and reported having seen the San Francisco, with her decks swept, her boats gone, and completely disabled; but was unable to render any assistance, and lost sight of her during the gale. The next day a brig arrived at Boston, bringing a similar report.

Government at once took measures to rescue those on board, should the wreck still float. The Revenue cutter Washington, the steamship Alabama, and the steamship Union, were sent out from this port to cruise in search of her. The Revenue cutter Forward, and two pilot boats, were sent from Philadelphia; the sloop-of-war Decatur, from Boston; a Revenue cutter from New London, another from Charleston, and another from Wilmington.

Thus matters remained up to dark Sixth-day night, Jan. 13th, when the British ship Three Bells, of Glasgow, an iron sailing vessel, arrived in New York harbor, bringing 135 of the San Francisco's passengers, including her officers and crew.

Lieut. Winder, one of the rescued passengers brought by the ship Three Bells, furnished the Tribune with the following narrative of occurrences on board the San Francisco:—

We left New York on the 21st of December, with most favorable weather. Our voyage promised to be an unusually pleasant one, for we had a ship whose qualities were of the first order, commanded by officers the most able and gentlemanly.

About nine o'clock on the morning of the second day, a tremendous gale sprung up, which increased to a hurricane, and about twelve o'clock at night our engines gave out, and soon after our foremast was carried away. The starboard wheel-house was smashed in by a tremendous sea, and a portion of the upper cabin was stove. I had retired early to my state-room, very sick, but the water coming into it freely, I concluded that it would be better to leave. My room was situated upon the upper deck. I left my room and went into the upper saloon. The first thing I saw was four or five waiters holding the doors of the saloon to prevent their being burst open by the wind. I went down into the lower cabin, and found a group of persons sitting upon mattresses near the foot of the stairs to keep themselves out of the water, which was washing about the cabin. I laid down upon one of the mattresses, and held on to the bannisters to keep myself from being dashed about the saloon; I soon fell asleep; how long I remained so I cannot tell, but I think it was not long.

It was near daylight when I was awakened by a tremendous crash, followed immediately by a large body of water rushing in a flood down the companion way. It fell upon me, and swept me twice across the cabin and back again, with stunning violence. With desperate effort I succeeded in regaining my feet, and saw some persons climbing up the steps and followed them. On reaching the deck, the first sights which met my eyes were the bodies of two men, who had been killed by the crushing in of the upper cabin; I crawled over one of the bodies and managed to find my way across the deck, holding on to various parts of the wreck; I got toward the stern, and fell in with two or three officers, and took a glance at the aspect of affairs; never shall I forget the harrowing spectacle —she presented the appearance of a total wreck. I was under the impression that she was full of water, and had settled down to the level of the deck. The surface of the water for a large space around was covered with the debris of the upper works, and holding on to these, and struggling amid the wreck of matter, were many men, I suppose 150, attempting to save themselves in the raging sea, by catching at the broken timbers. The wind was blowing a perfect hurricane, and it was with the utmost difficulty that I held on and prevented myself from being blown overboard. Not a sound was heard from the drowning men, as they strove, with all the energy of despair, to save themselves. There they were, 150 human beings, beyond the possibility of human succor, and soon the last one sank to rise no more.

On looking around I saw Lieut. Murray, of the Navy, standing at the mizzen mast, and went aft to him. I held on there for a while, until the first mate came aft for the purpose of cutting it away, but the sea and hurricane were too violent to admit of his so doing. I then returned to the first position I occupied. Here were three other officers, one lady and a child—Major Wise, wife and child, together with Lieuts. Chandler and Van Voost, and Drs. Satterlee and Wirt. We sat ruminating on the prospect before us, and none of us had the slighest hope of escape. At this time several negro waiters came along with life preservers, and a soldier brought me one; but the weather was so intensely cold, and the prospect that our misery would only be unnecessarily prolonged seemed so apparent, that we made no use of them. The sea was making a breach over us at every roll, and the exposure was so benumbing that we cast about us for shelter. We discovered that there were many persons in the lower cabin, principally the ladies of the officers; we went below, and afterward induced Major Wise to bring his wife and child down also, as the ship was not in such bad condition as we had anticipated. We found there some of the ladies, together with a number of officers and children, collected at the after part of the saloon. The forward part of the cabin had been crushed in by the force of the tremendous sea already alluded to; at each roll of the ship large bodies of water entered the cabin at the crushed-in part of the deck. We covered ourselves with wet blankets, for we were nearly frozen, few of us having on any other clothing but our shirts and drawers. Here we remained the greater part of the day, supposing it would not be long ere the vessel would sink.

Some time during the evening Captain Watkins came into the cabin, and requested that the officers would all go out to bailing, and assist in keeping the ship afloat. Two officers went out at a time, and set the men to bailing out the engine-room; as soon as one gang of men became exhausted, we set new relays to work, and thus kept up the work all night. But notwithstanding our most strenuous endeavors, the water kept gaining on us, the pumps having become choked. The bailing was kept up for several days and nights, during which time the violence of the sea greatly subsided. We then got the pumps to work, and succeeded in keeping the ship nearly free from water. The captain and officers by extraordinary exertions, stopped some of the worst leaks around the guards, and at the end of the beam. The decks were then temporarily repaired, by planking, and nailing sail and oil cloths over them. We kept reliefs of three or four men with mattresses at each end of the shaft, to prevent the water from coming in there.

About this time—for I have no recollection of dates, as I deemed our case hopeless, and kept no record of events—we were cheered by the prospect of getting the machinery in working order. A temporary steering apparatus was erected, and an attempt made to get the ship under way. Up to this time she had been rolling about mastless and rudderless, a huge log upon the ocean. After one or two revolutions of the wheels, the machinery gave out, and all further attempt was pronounced hopeless; thus were our hopes blasted. As nothing further could be done than to keep the pumps in operation, we followed this up with the most scrupulous assiduity for several days, when two vessels hove in sight, and again lighted up our gloomy prospects. One of the ships, the Napoleon, came alongside. We were then lightening our ship as much as possible, by throwing over provisions and heavy articles. The Napoleon promised to stay by us, but after picking up as many provisions as she wanted, left us during the night.

We found that the ship bid fair to keep afloat, and began to take such measures for our personal comfort as the circumstances would admit of, in the way of obtaining dry clothing and proper food. Hope again began to dawn upon our prospects, notwithstanding the extreme roughness of the weather. The next visitor to cheer us, was the bark Kilby, of Boston. Capt. Watkins went on board and made a contract for the conveyance of all the passengers to the nearest port; he then called for volunteers to stay by him, as he intended to make one more attempt to save his ship. In ten minutes he had twenty men, the number he required, who volunteered to stay by him and aid in the attempt. We sent an officer and some twenty men on board the Kilby to throw over her cargo and lighten her for the reception of the tempest-tossed passengers. About 2 o'clock P. M., we commenced transhipping the ladies and children in small boats, and by night had about 100 men, women, and children transferred to her, intending to complete the transhipment in the morning. About 7 or 8 P. M. we were alarmed by the new danger of fire; we found the ship to be on fire near the cook's galley; after some considerable exertion, we succeeded in extinguishing it. During the night a heavy gale sprung up, accompanied by the worst cross sea we had been subjected to during the whole voyage. Our vessel commenced leaking badly, and the gangs of bailers were set to work as before; our labor was much increased by the giving out of the pumps; we continued to bail with increased vigor until the afternoon of the next day, when the engines were again got to work, and our exhausted men were favored with a short respite from their toil. The men had become so much exhausted that we had great difficulty in keeping them to their work. In the morning we could discover no sign of the bark Kilby, and suppose she made for the nearest port, as she could not safely have remained looking for us in the heavy weather which prevailed. When the Kilby left she had but a small quantity of provisions and water; great doubts are expressed of her safety. Provisions were being conveyed on board of the Kilby, and a boat that was sent to her for that purpose was unable to return, owing to the roughness of the weather. I may as well relate a melancholy incident in this connection. On board this boat was Commissary Sergeant McIntyre; he was carried off by the Kilby, while his wife and two children remained on board the San Francisco. The mother and one of her children died on board the Three Bells; the second child, a fair-haired little boy of three years, has been adopted by the soldiers, who tend him with almost parental solicitude.

But to return—Toward daylight, on this morning, the aspect of our affairs was the darkest and most disheartening that we had. During that day the pumps were declared useless; we kept quiet, however; the ladies being out of the way, we felt somewhat relieved. To lighten the ship we cut holes through the deck, and commenced throwing the fuel and other heavy articles overboard.

About two days after this time, the Three Bells, Capt. Creighton, came in sight; we first saw his lights during the night, and fired signal guns for assistance. He bore up for us in the morning, but the sea ran so high that we could only communicate by means of writing questions and answers with chalk in large letters upon a board. In reply to our request to lay by us, he said he was short of provisions and leaking badly. He wore ship and passed us; as he did so, himself and crew gave us three hearty cheers as an assurance that he would not desert us; be assured we replied to these demonstrations no less heartily. He drew ahead and laid his vessel to and remained by us during the night. On the next day, the sea still running very high, and we having no boats and he only two, we made two rafts for conveying the passengers on board his ship, but found that they could not live in the sea that was then running. On the third night came near losing him. On the fourth day another sail appeared to windward of us, close by the Three Bells, and the latter signaled her. Both bore down for us. The second ship proved to be the Antarctic, bound for Liverpool. Both laid by us that night, as it was too rough to do any thing more than getting off a few of the men. On the fifth day, being fine, we transported all of the officers, passengers and crew, with the exception of the ship's officers, engineers and firemen, numbering some 25 or 30 men. We also succeeded in getting some provisions and water conveyed on board of the Three Bells. We kept the men at the pumps during the day and night, and discovered and stopped her leak. The next morning we got off all the remainder of those who were on the San Francisco, and made sail for New York, and the Antarctic sailed for Liverpool.

Previous to falling in with the Three Bells, a sort of congestive diarrhea broke out among the men on board the San Francisco, owing to exposure to wet and cold, overwork, and an undue indulgence in the potted meats, pickled cabbage, &c. Those who were seized by this disease, died in a few hours after the attack. Corporal Smith, of Company G., came to me and said his child was sick; the doctor visited it, and an hour after the man himself sent for me, as he was dying; I went to him and ascertained that such was the case. Soon after I was informed by his wife that her husband and child were dead. I had her brought into the cabin and put into a state room with her child and sister. During the night the mother was found dead, and she was followed soon after by the other child. The sister still survives. Many cases occurred, and many robust persons were seized in one hour and dead the next. About thirty persons died upon the Three Bells.

This ship brought home 135 men, as follows: Companies G, 14; A, 18; D, 25; L, 19; B, 14; I, 12; H, 12; K, 13; and 8 musicians. The Antarctic carried off Lieuts. C. S. Winder, and J. G. Chandler, together with 175 non-commissioned officers, women, musicians and privates.

When we arrived in port we had just half a day's allowance of water and the continuance of the fog would have placed us in a desperate situation. For several days previous we were put upon short allowance of water, so that you see we escaped one peril, but came near suffering another not much less appalling.

The passengers by the bark Kilby arrived in New York on Sunday, having been taken off by the ship Lucy Thompson, just in time to save them from starvation.

The conduct of Capt. Watkins is everywhere extolled to the utmost. He went to England in the Antartic, with about 225 others. The Antartic was well provided with water and provisions.

The whole number on board the San Francisco when she left was 750. About 225 were put on board the Antartic, 230 came here in the Three Bells, about 100 by the Kilby, and near 200 were lost by being washed overboard, or died of cholera.

It seems to be generally conceded (says the N. Y. Tribune) that the ill-fated steamer San Francisco was overloaded, and that to this cause is to be imputed the disaster that befel her. The builder of her engines states that when she went to sea her guards were scarcely more than two feet out of water.

OCEAN PENNY POSTAGE.—A meeting in favor of Ocean Penny or two-cent Postage, was held at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on the evening of the 6th inst. Mayor Westervelt presided, and addresses were delivered by Eliuh Burritt, John P. Hale, and others. The following petition to Congress, which was adopted by the meeting, embodies the leading ideas of the addresses, and shows what sentiments prevailed. A Committee was appointed to prepare a petition for public signature:—

The citizens of New York, assembled in public meeting in the Broadway Tabernacle, Jan. 6, 1854, Hon. Jacob A. Westervelt, Mayor of the City, presiding, for the purpose of considering the subject of ocean postage, respectfully represent—

That they are fully persuaded that the present high rates of ocean postage are a very serious restriction upon the mercantile correspondence between the United States and other countries, impeding commerce, and imposing a heavy tax upon the community at large.

That they are a grievous and oppressive burden upon that large and industrial class of the population of this country who were born in Europe, aggravating the bitterness of their separation from relatives and friends in the old world, and, in many cases, sundering the nearest relations of life.

That they interfere with many of the most valuable institutions in this country, by imposing upon their foreign correspondence restrictions and expenses highly injurious to their successful progress.

They therefore pray your honorable body to adopt, as soon as possible, measures for reducing the charge of ocean postage to the uniform rate of two cents for the mere transportation of a single letter from any port of the United States to any port beyond the sea, at which the American mail steamers may regularly touch.

One day last week, about noon, Dr. W. R. T. Lutener, a physician somewhat celebrated for effecting cures of the ear and eye, was found dead in his office, located on the second floor, front room, of the premises No. 458 Broadway, corner of Grand-st., New York. A ball had entered the back part of his head, and a pistol was lying on the floor near by. The position of the wound, and other circumstances, render it probable that he was shot by an enemy. A lawyer named Hayes, and the woman who lived with him, were arrested on suspicion of having committed the deed. Both of them had quarreled with the Doctor, and threatened to have revenge.

Several persons connected with the Cunard steamships are under arrest in New York for smuggling diamonds, jewelry, watches, &c. The steamer Andes was compelled to give bonds before sailing for Liverpool last week.

The notes of the Mechanics' Bank of Watertown were protested at the agency, in Albany, on Wednesday evening, Jan. 18. This is an individual bank. Its circulation, when the September report was made, was $47,080.

MARRIED,

At Shiloh, N. J., January 6th, by Eld. W. B. Gillett, Mr. JOHN EVANS, of Allowaystown, to Miss HELEN N. WEST, daughter of Isaac West, Esq., of Shiloh.

By Eld. James Summerbell, Jan. 7th, 1854, at the Seventh-day Baptist house of worship, Adams Center, N. Y., Mr. ALMANSON BRUNDRIGE to Miss SUSAN JANE GREENE, daughter of Mr. Spicer Greene, all of Adams Center.

In Preston, N. Y., Jan. 9th, 1854, by J. C. Maxson, Esq., Mr. HENRY J. CRANDALL, of DeRuyter, to Miss MARY C. MAXSON, of the former place.

DIED,

Near Shiloh, N. J., December 30th, 1853, HANNAH S., wife of Joseph T. Mayhew, and daughter of Lewis Davis, deceased. Mrs. Mayhew professed faith in Christ, and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Shiloh, when about fourteen years old. From that time until sickness confined her at home, she was faithful to fill her place in the house of God, and to mingle in melodious strains with those who delighted to sing the praises of God. She was peculiarly fond of good singing. She was one who was much beloved for her amiable character, her graceful accomplishments, and more especially for the ardent piety that adorned her life. But that youthful vigor and graceful form became the seat of disease, the consumption. Her afflictions were long, lingering, and painful. At times she and her friends entertained hope of her recovery, but for more than a year all hopes were gone; for months and weeks she waited patiently and anxiously for the time of her deliverance from mortality and pain, often saying, towards the close of her life, "I want to go"—"Though I walk through the dark valley and the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." On the evening of the thirtieth, without a struggle, her spirit took its flight. She was in her twenty-seventh year, leaving a husband, a sister, and a widowed mother, to mourn their loss; but they mourn not as those without hope. "The memory of the just is blessed." Her funeral was attended, January 2d, by a large concourse of friends, and a sermon preached by her pastor, from Psalms 17: 15, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness."

In South Kingston, R. I., Dec. 30th, 1853, Mrs. ELIZABETH CRANDALL, wife of Dea. Clarke Crandall, in the 42d year of her age. The deceased and her husband were formerly members of the Baptist Church, but about seven years ago they embraced the Bible Sabbath, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in South Kingston. In the death of this sister, her husband has lost a faithful companion, her children a praying mother, and the church a zealous advocate for the cause of truth. Her end was peace, leaving behind, to those that mourn, the hope that she now "rests from her labors."

In Charlestown, R. I., on the 25th of November, 1853, of typhus fever, Mrs. NANCY HISCOX, wife of Arnold Hiscox, in the 65th year of her age. Sister Hiscox professed religion when about 17 years old, was baptized by Eld. Abram Coon, and united with the 1st Hopkinton Church, where she remained a member until death. She was a consistent and faithful member —bore her afflictions with patience—gave up her family and friends with composure—and died in full hope of a blissful immortality.

In Clarkville, Madison Co., N. Y., Jan. 1, 1854, Mrs. FANNY FRINK, wife of Asa Frink, of dropsy, aged 49 years. Sister Frink bore her suffering, though great, with Christian fortitude and patience. She died in hope of immortality, saying, as she expired, "I am going home to heaven." By this providence a fond husband and an affectionate daughter have been bereft of a faithful wife and doating mother.

In Brookfield, N. Y., Dec. 29th, 1853, MARY, daughter of Charles and Miriam Foster, of hemorrhage, aged, 19 years. She left her friends the satisfactory hope that their loss is her eternal gain.

"She seemed beloved by all,
While here she made her stay;
And now to brighter worlds, we trust,
She's wing'd her shining way."

In Wellsville, N. Y., Dec. 25th, 1853, after a short illness, Mrs. JANE EASTMAN, aged 30 years. Sister Eastman professed faith in Christ in early life, and united with the Second Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, with which she remained a worthy member until she departed this life. She met death with composure. J. K.

At his residence in Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., Jan. 1, 1854, of a disease of the heart, Mr. THOMAS HULL, in the 63d year of his age.

In New Market, N. J., on the 31st ult., Miss CATHARINE F. RANDOLPH, aged 29 years. Her last hours were peaceful, and we trust she has gone to receive the reward of the faithful. Her funeral was attended by a large concourse of weeping friends.

Business Notice.—The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society has been in operation nearly five years—long enough, certainly, to carry on the publishing business without a thorough settlement of accounts. Such a settlement we intend to have before the close of the present volume of the Sabbath Recorder. An Agent has been engaged for the purpose, who will enter upon his work about the first of February. Those indebted to the establishment need be in no doubt as to the amount of their indebtedness, inasmuch as bills have been sent them each year. What we wish now to say to them is, that in all cases where the amount of those bills is forwarded to us immediately, by mail direct, or through our local agents, the accounts will be squared on our books. In all cases where payment is delayed until the Agent calls, fifty cents per year will be added, according to our published terms. Promptness will save the trouble and expense of a call from the agent.

Miscellaneous.

The Voice of Autumn.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

There comes, from yonder hight,
A soft repining sound,
Where forest leaves are bright,
And fall, like flakes of light,
To the ground.

It is the autumn breeze,
That, lightly floating on,
Just skims the weedy leas,
Just stirs the glowing trees,
And is gone.

He moans by sedgy brook,
And visits, with a sigh,
The last pale flowers that look,
From out their sunny nook,
At the sky.

O'er shouting children flies
That light October wind,
And, kissing cheeks and eyes,
He leaves their merry cries
Far behind.

And wanders on to make
That soft uneasy sound
By distant wood and lake,
Where distant fountains break
From the ground.

No bower where maidens dwell
Can win a moment's stay;
Nor fair untrodden dell;
He sweeps the upland swell,
And away!

Mourn'st thou thy homeless state?
Oh soft, repining wind!
That early seek'st and late
The rest it is thy fate
Not to find.

Not on the mountain's breast,
Not on the ocean's shore,
In all the East and West:—
The wind that stops to rest
Is no more.

By valleys, woods, and springs,
No wonder thou shouldst grieve
For all the glorious things
Thou touchest with thy wings
And must leave.

The Astor Library.

The building having been completed, and the books properly arranged, the Astor Library was thrown open to public inspection during the first week of January, and is now open for public use, without charge. No books are loaned from it, but every convenience for reading or study is afforded to those who desire to resort to it. Of the contents of the Library, Dr. Cogswell has given, through the Home Journal, the following account:—

"The number of volumes in the Astor Library is now nearly eighty thousand. It is proper to add, that some thousands of these are double and triple volumes, bound together, for the sake of economy; had these remained as they were bought, the whole number would be considerably greater than it is. To estimate the value of a library by the number of volumes it contains, is about as correct a mode as it would be to estimate it by the number of pounds they weigh. The truth of this assertion is easily made out. In this collection a dozen volumes might be taken, the average cost of which was two hundred, another fifty, of an average of one hundred dollars per volume; and then an equal number be selected which did not cost half as many cents per volume. An average of things so totally unlike in value, should never be thought of.

The system of classification is that of Brunet, whose great work on Bibliography, entitled 'Manuel du Libraire,' is better, more complete, and more generally known, than any similar publication. The arrangement begins with Theology. In this department the Astor Library has 3,752 volumes, including the best editions of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, the Walton Polyglott, various editions of the Vulgate, and numerous versions of the whole Bible, and of parts of it, in the principal languages of Europe and the East. Jurisprudence forms the second department, which numbers 3,107 volumes. In this the object has been to provide those works which are rarely found here, rather than to form a law library. The number of volumes in the medical department of the library is only 1,751. This, as a speciality, is so well provided for in the hospital and other medical libraries of the City, it was thought less important to make a full collection of medical books here. The Natural Sciences form another division of this department, and this is one of the richest and best furnished in the library. The whole number of volumes embraced in it is 4,249. The third division of Sciences and Arts is that of Chemistry and Physics, to which, from the intimate relation it bears to them, may be added that of the useful arts or Polytechnics. The transactions of Societies for the promotion of Science and Arts may also be assigned to it. These collections contain so many memoirs and papers of prime importance to practical men, as well as to men of science, which are published in no other form, that it was deemed necessary to have them as complete as possible in the library. This desideratum is now nearly attained. In the Metaphysical and Ethical Sciences, the books now belonging to the library amount to 1,500 volumes. Next in order are the Mathematical Sciences, of which the Astor Library has a first rate collection. A very competent judge, who is a resident in Berlin, considers the collection as more complete than that of the Royal Library there. The number of volumes contained in it may be put down at 5,000. In the four branches of the Fine Arts proper, and including Archaiology, which cannot be separated from ancient art, there are in the collection about 2,500 volumes, upon the first fifty of which $2,975 were expended. A complete set of "Piranesi's Antiquities," proof plates, twenty-eight in twenty-one volumes; "Musée Fransais et Royale," proof plates before the letter, six volumes; "Raphael's Loggie of the Vattican," engraved by Volpato, and exquisitely colored by hand, in the exact style of the originals, three volumes; a complete set of the "Grecian Antiquities," thirteen volumes; Gruner's "Fresco Decorations of Italy," colored by hand in the same style as "Raphael's Loggie," one volume, and "Lepsius' Denkmaler aus Ægypten," six volumes. In books on languages the library is strong—perhaps I might say very strong; its linguistic apparatus would do credit to a much older institution. It has grammars and dictionaries of one hundred and four different languages, and numerous vocabularies of the rude, unwritten ones. In the Oriental collection there are two works which must be so rare in this country that it may be important to describe them; and these are the "Seven Seas: a Dictionary and Grammar of the Persian Language," in seven volumes, folio, by the late King of Oude, which was printed in his palace; and the "Sabda Kalpa Druma of the Rajah Radhakant Deb," a Sanscrit Dictionary, in seven volumes, folio—the last two not yet received. The whole linguistic collection numbers two thousand one hundred volumes. The history of Greek and Latin literature is neither a very strong nor a weak department of the library; it is just about as it ought to be, to stand neither above nor below its fair proportion. It contains a copy of one or more editions of all the authors of note in both languages. In Spanish and Portugese literature the nnmber of volumes is six hundred and seventy-three. The Italian, though not fuller in proportion, has one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one. In coming to the French we find a still more copious literature; in this the library has three thousand one hundred and one volumes. German literature is of a more recent growth than either of those, previously named. Of the fourteen hundred volumes in this language of the class of belles lettres, certainly one thousand must be the productions of the present century, and not above one hundred anterior to the middle of the last. The collection of Scandinavian Literature, distinct from the Sagas and other historical works, amounts to 809 volumes. In the Hungarian and in the Slavonic languages collectively, we have only 41. In the collection of the English Literature, very few of the works of much value will be found wanting. It now numbers 3,400 volumes, more than 300 of which are exclusively Shaksperian literature. The Historical Department constitutes a fourth part at least of the whole library. To the American Historical Department a larger space in the library has been assigned than to any other, because it is intended to make this the most complete. The collection already formed contains most of the early Spanish writers; the early voyages, the accounts of the first colonists, the various histories of the war of Independence, and the older books generally. It now numbers 3,407 volumes, making all the divisions of history 20,350 volumes. The library possesses a complete collection of English Parliamentary Journals, Debates and Reports. These amount to more than 2,000 volumes, chiefly folios.

Improvement in Steam Navigation.

The London Globe publishes the following account of the new principle of steam propulsion:—

"Considerable interest has been excited in Edinburg by the successful trial of the steam vessel lately launched at Granton for a deep sea fishing, as demonstrating the practicability of a new principle of steam propulsion, superseding both the screw and the paddle, as likely to effect, in some degree, a revolution in the art of steam navigation. The vessel is 100 feet long, with engines of 30 horse power. Externally there is nothing to distinguish it from a sailing vessel, except the presence on each side of the hull of a curved pipe 10 inches in diameter, termed a nozzle, communicating with a water-tight iron case inside. In the bottom of the vessel are apertures admitting the water into the water-tight case with a horizontal wheel fixed on a crank-shaft attached by piston-rods to the engine, and, on the steam being applied, the water-wheel revolves with velocity, and the water is discharged by the nozzles on each side of the vessel. These form the only propelling power, and the invention is remarkable for its simplicity and effect. These nozzles also are of service in navigating the vessel, which, according to the angle of depression or elevation, turns in any direction, or stops altogether, even with the engines working at full power. Although capacity rather than speed was studied in the construction of the vessel, it easily attained 11 knots an hour. Economy of fuel, freedom from vibration, light draught, and a high rate of speed are among the advantages of the invention. The vessel is being schooner-rigged, and, when fitted with boats and fishing gear, it will proceed to the fishing ground in the Firth of Forth, and, by lowering the boats and crews, will be able to conduct the fishing operations with safety and celerity. Messrs. Ruthven, of Edinburg, are the inventors, and the vessel is the first of the fleet of the Deep Sea Fishing Association of Scotland."

Description of Mr. Jefferson.

In a series of pen and ink portraits by Edward William Johnson, of Virginia, we find the annexed sketch of Thomas Jefferson's personal appearance, and of his conversational powers:—

Dressed, within doors, as I saw him last, no longer in the red breeches which were once famous as his favorite, and rather conspicuous attire, but still vindicating by a capacious waistcoat, his attachment to that republican color; in gray shorts, small silver knee buckles, gray woolen stockings, black slippers, a blue body coat, surmounted by a gray spencer; tall, and though lithe of person, and decidedly graceful and agile of motion and carriage, yet long and ill-limbed. Mr. Jefferson's figure was commanding and striking, though bad, and his face most animated and agreeable, though remarkably ugly. His legs, you perceive, by no means shunned observation, yet they were scarcely larger at the kness than at the ankles, and had never been conscious of a calf. Still, though without strength, they had always borne him along with vigor and suppleness.

These bodily qualities and a health almost unfailing, he preserved in a most singular degree, to the very close of his life. At the time I speak of, when he was in his eighty-first year, he not only mounted his horse without assistance, and rode habitually ten miles a day, but, dismounting at a fence breast-high, would leap over it by only placing his hand on the topmost rail. He then walked not only well and swiftly, but with lightness and springiness of tread such as few young men ever have. It was a restless activity of mind, which informed all this unusual mobility of body; and the two, I think, were in him greatly alike. For his intellect had, like his person, more size than shape, more adroitness than force, more suppleness than solidity, and effected its ends by continuity of action, not mass of power, by manipulation, not mascularity. You may batter to pieces with a small hammer that which a common ball would not shiver. He was never idle; nay, hardly a moment still. He rose early and was up late, through his life; and was all day, whenever out, on foot or horseback, at study, at work, or in conversation. If his legs and fingers were at rest, his tongue was sure to be going. Indeed, even when seated in his library, in a low Spanish chair, he held forth to his visitors an almost endless flow of fine discourse; his body seemed impatient of keeping still, for his mind shifted his position all the while, and so twisted itself about that you might almost have thought he was attitudinizing. Meantime, his face, expressive as it was ugly, was not much less busy than his limbs, in bearing its part in the conversation, and kept up, all the while, the most speaking by play, an eloquence of the countenance as great as ugly features could well have.

You have seen his portraits, his busts, the bronze statue—faithful enough except as to the limbs—which the Israelite Navy Captain bought in Paris at the price of old clothes, and offered to Congress, but which it put by with disdain, as a stroke of speculation, meant to procure professional advancement not earned in any other way. From all these, one gets just enough idea of the mere mould of physiognomy; but none, of course, of that mobility which was its only fine quality, nor the oddity of his complexion. There was much, in its general tint, of the color of cream; but as that substance is one of which you, good people of the great city of Gotham, conceive only as a modification of prepared chalk, let me explain, by what they have oftener seen—the fruity part of a pumpkin pie. The face looked as if it were buttered with such a paste; but, in addition to this ghastliness of hue, it was sprinkled with small-pox pits, all of which were of a lively purple. Bad as was the uncontrasted, you may imagine what its beauty became, when set off by such a foil. As to features, he had not one that was good, exept the eyes; they were of a grayish blue, clear and sparkling. His head was well set and well carried, but had the Jacobinical shape and air; his hair was originally reddish, but turned to an ill-bleached foxiness; his forehead was large, but not well modeled in those main frontal regions which bespeak loftiness of thought and creativeness of imagination; it indicated clearness, not greatness. His brows were neither strong nor soft, but irregular and uncertain, as those of one who was wanting in will, and yet had not much feeling. His nose was mean—a small tube ending in a sudden bulb; it was much cocked up, and derived from that shape a character of pertness and vulgarity.

His mouth was rather large, but the lips thin and not well cut; the expression sitting on them bland, but not benevolent, conciliating rather than kindly; its meaning assigned his emotions to the manners, not to the heart—to policy, not the temper. The chin was, like the forehead, broader than it was strong. Such were the lineaments in detail; quite indifferent, separately; and yet, altogether, very impressive and agreeable. As his motions, light and easy, were the contradiction of his ill-made limbs, so was his pleasing and animated countenance that of features of themselves, ignoble apart.

Lastly, his conversation—he certainly was one of the best talkers I have ever listened to; copious in the extreme, without ever growing tedious; easy yet compact; flowing but never loose; very variously, and to all appearance soundly informed, and continually dealing out his information, but rather as if to gratify you, not himself; his mind seemed to me, then, a great repository of the knowledge that is gotten from others, not of the wisdom that must come out from one's self. Trained in what was once its best school, the Parisian saloons—he understood his conversation thoroughly as an art, and he made the most of it as an engine of personal influence, and for the propagation of his party opinions. Towards the inculcation of these, his conversation, whatever the subject, was bent, except when a scientific matter was in question; either he knew no literature, law, history, philosophy, morals, nor theology, or he could not talk of them, unless as connected, in some direct or indirect way, with democratic theories. His power, indeed, of winning and controlling men, always laid chiefly in his skill in personal communication; for, even in public bodies, he rarely made speeches, nor have we any record of his having ever shone as an orator. In short, not feeling strong enough to attack men's convictions by the front gate of manful eloquence, he stole in by the back door of address, and of insinuation in private.

European Experience.

The Richmond Examiner, in answer to inquiries concerning the health of Mr. John M. Daniel, its former editor, and his opinions of Europe, publishes the following extracts from one of his recent letters of private correspondence:—

"It may be strange, but it is nevertheless true, that I have been as really and truly homesick for the last three months as ever was any little girl in her first quarter at the boarding school. If you knew how much pleasanter a life of real work and study in the United States is than this nonsensical travel and idleness, you would not be so discontented. One will only learn by experience, however; and the best thing I expect to get, personally, out of this mission, is just this—that I will be satisfied when I get back, and never again be haunted by those intolerable longings for Europe, which tormented me in the years gone by.

"The pleasure of actually seeing celebrated places is small. It is all anticipation and memory. The real comforts of Europe don't compare with those of the United States. Everything costs just double what it does at home. The people are nowhere as good as ours. The women are uglier—the men have fewer ideas. I intended to write a book about it all; and I thought, when I left the United States, that I would have to stretch the blanket a good deal to make out our superiority. But there is no need. The meanness, the filthy life, the stupidities of all the countries I have seen, surpassed all I expected, and all I hoped.

"Here, in Turin, which is the most beautiful city I have ever seen, I am busy learning to speak French and studying what is popularly, but most falsely, termed the 'great world' and 'polite society.' I have dined with dukes, jabbered bad grammar to countesses, and am spunged on for seats in my opera box by counts, who stink of garlick as does the whole country. I receive visits from other diplomats, with titles as long as a flag-staff, and heads as empty as their hearts, and find the whole concern more trashy than I have ever imagined. I must, however, keep up their miserable acquaintance, for that is the way to see the 'elephant' of European life. So I dance the dance of fools, like the best of them, and return their visits seduously, carrying about great cards, like that I inclose for your inspection.

"The pictures, the operas and the ballets of Europe are good things; the people, the governments, and the society more contemptible than can be conceived.

"I have not yet got altogether well of my dreadful attack of last July. Till shortly after I got here I was troubled with a chronic irritation—the remains of my epidemic—which annoyed me excessively. I was cured of it by a physician who is the cleverest person I have seen. He gave me a decoction of tamarinds and poppies, a tumbler full every three hours, and a hot bath every morning. In some things I think better of European medical practice than our own. I find the idea current among them, which I have often broached to you, that chemistry is not competent to extract all the essential components of natural productions."

How to Tell a Good Teacher.

A gentleman from Swampville, State of New York, was telling how many occupations he had attempted. Among others, he had tried school teaching.

"How long did you teach?" asked a bystander.

"Wal, I didn't teach long; that is, I only went to teach."

"Did you hire out?"

"Wal, I didn't hire out; I only went to hire out."

"Why did you give it up?"

"Wal, I gave it up—for some reason or nuther. You see, I traveled into a deestrict and inquired for the trustees. Somebody said Mr. Snickles was the man I wanted to see. So I found Mr. Snickles—named my objic, interducing myself—and asked him what he thought about letting me try my luck with the big boys and unruly gals in the deestrict. He wanted to know if I raally considered myself capable; and I told him I wouldn't mind his asking me a few easy questions in 'rithmetic and jography, or showing my handwriting. But he said no, never mind, he could tell a good teacher by his gait. Let me see you walk off a little ways, says he, and I can tell, says he, jist's well's I'd heard you examined, says he.

"He sot in the door, as he spoke, and I thought he looked a little skittish; but I was consid'erable frustrated, and didn't mind much; so turned about and walked off as smart as I know'd how. He said he'd tell me when to stop, so I kep' on till I thought I'd gone far enough—then I s'pected s'thing was to pay, and looked round. Wal, the door was shet, and Snickles was gone!"

"Did you go back?"

"Wal, no—I didn't go back."

"Did you apply for another school?"

"Wal, no—I didn't apply for another school," said the gentleman from Swampville. "I rather judged my appearance was against me."

Vicious Cattle.

The common vice of jumping and throwing fence is taught to cattle, with scarcely an exception, by their owners and care-takers. Fences half down, soon fall by the rubbing of cattle, and teach the first lesson, especially if cattle have any shrewdeess in observing cause and effect. Very fine food just over a poor fence, is the next lesson; letting down bars and rail fences to the calves, from laziness, so that the animal has to leap, is the third lesson—and this last is often first, second, and third with sheep, until they will scale anything. These three lessons are usually enough, but a fourth is often added—placing one aditional rail on the fence each successive day, for the ostensible purpose of keeping the jumper within bounds, but really operating as a most ingenious contrivance to teach the art of vaulting. We have read of French being "taught in six lessons," but very few animals require more than the above four to enable them to take "French leave" of any ordinary enclosure. [Country Gentleman.

Newspaper Composition.

This is a distinct and difficult art. Its principles must be somewhat carefully studied by those who would succeed in it. The disregard of these principles is the cause of the prosiness which characterizes so much of our newspaper literature. The newspaper is not a thing to be studied—scarcely one to be read. It is to be glanced over. The articles, then, must be so written as to attract and hold attention. Processes of thought and reasoning are to be shut out; results only are to appear. Argument is to be suggested, rather than stated. Usually one point is enough for an article. Some single nail should be struck fair upon the head, and then left at once. Introductions are a nuisance. Inferences are always skipped. The sentences should be short. Every word should leap with life. Condensation should be extreme. Subordinate thoughts should be thrown away. The object is not to treat a subject in full, but to produce a certain effect. All that is not necessary to the effect should be discarded. He who has the nerve to do this, with a soul that fires with a great thought, and the manliness to utter it freely, may wield a power with the pen which no sceptre can rival.

The tendencies in professional life are to deterioration of style. The constant didactism of the pulpit often degenerates into diffuseness. The reiteration of points at the bar, and the precision of legal style, tend to produce dryness and reputation. In no way can the professional man more effectively make his words instinct with life and power, than by weekly practice in the columns of a newspaper. [Examiner.

POULTRY EXHIBITION.—A National Poultry Society was organized in New York on the 5th inst., with P. T. Barnum for President, A. B. Allen for Secretary, and R. B. Coleman for Treasurer. Several hundred dollars were subscribed, which will be offered in premiums for the best specimens of fowls that can be produced from any part of the United States.

The Society resolved to hold a grand National Poultry Show in New York on the 13th day of February next, continuing several days. This will include the exhibition of all kinds of fowls, pea-fowls, ducks, geese, swan, fancy pigeons, gold and silver pheasants, &c. Premiums will also be offered for the best specimens of rabbits, rat terrier dogs and deer.

Exhibitors will be admitted free at all times during the exhibition.

Food and water will be provided by the Society for all Fowls on Exhibition, and proper persons will be appointed to regularly feed and provide for them without inconvenience to the owner.

Fowls intended for Exhibition may be sent in advance of the time to the Managers at Adams' Express Office, New York.

Every coop is to be marked with the true name of the Fowls exhibited, and when they are for sale, the price asked is to be legibly marked thereon.

DISASTERS ON THE LAKES IN 1853.—We find in the Buffalo Express a statement by G. W. Rounds, Agent for the North-western Insurance Company, in relation to the Lake Disasters for the last year—amounting to two hundred and sixty-six. Loss of property, $874,143. Lives lost 81. Of the two hundred and sixty-six disasters here detailed, nineteen occurred in April, thirty in May, seventeen in June, eleven in July, twenty-eight in August, thirty in September, thirty in October, eighty in November, and twelve in December. Six steamers, two propellers and thirty sail vessels have gone out of existence entirely. The number of accidents exceeds those of last year by thirty seven, while the loss of property is less by $118,516.

VARIETY.

The papers speak very enthusiastically of Louis Auer of the Imperial printing office at Vienna, who has invented a new mode of producing from natural objects, from flowers for instance, plates which serve to be printed from at once. He places a flower or a leaf between a lead and a copper plate, and by means of pressure obtains upon the leaden plate a perfect impression of the most delicate parts of the object. These plates serve as a matrix for an elastic substance like gutta percha, from which an electrotype is made which is used to print from. One of our fellow citizens of New York has done more than this; he takes from a copper plate engraving on paper, an impression upon gutta percha; from this elastic matrix he makes an electrotype or an elastic plate, from which he prints and produces an exact copy of the original.

The devotees of 'Spiritualism" are circulating a Memorial to Congress, asking the appointment of a Scientific Commission to scrutinize the alleged phenomena of Rapping, Writing, Table-Moving, Music-playing, phosphorescent illumination, movement of ponderable bodies without the interposition of visible agency, &c. &c., which are occurring throughout the country. The memorial states that some of the signers suppose these phenomena to be produced by spirits of departed human beings, while others "entertain the opinion that the acknowledged principles of physics and metaphysics will enable scientific inquiries to account for all the facts in a rational and scientific manner."

The Rev. Dr. D. V. McLean, President of Lafayette College, at Easton, Pa., has obtained subscriptions toward the endowment of that institution to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, and in honor of this success, there was recently a grand illumination of the College, and a torch-light procession of the students through the principal streets of the borough. Addresses were made by the President of the College and by several members of the Senior Class, and the occasion was one of great joy and satisfaction to the friends of this rapidly rising institution. The college is now in a highly prosperous condition.

The Agricultural Society of Champagne County, Ohio, certify that Hugh McDonald received the premium for the best acre of corn, an average one out of a field of 45 acres, which yielded one hundred and forty-five bushels and three pecks, by actual measurement of one row, carefully selected by the Committee as an average one, and estimated from that for an acre. It is estimated that the whole field would have averaged 140 bushels per acre.

Judge Irwin, in the U. S. Circuit Court at Pittsburgh, committed Kirkpatrick, one of the ring-leaders in the Erie riots to the Allegany County Jail, during the pleasure of the Court, or until released by due course of law, for violating an injunction of that Court, in aiding and abetting in the destruction of the railway track at Erie. The Court also instructed the Marshal to report to it all such persons as were resisting its injunction, by preventing the repairs at Harbor Creek, and other places.

The following is a small portion of the standing army of the Republic of the United States. Ohio has 12,000 school districts and 36,000 directors. There are 838,000 youths between the ages of four and twenty-one years who depend on the common schools for their education. What a force for a single State! How much more safety to the institutions of the country is comprised in the moral power of these 838,000 youths than in the same number of soldiers kept as a standing army!

The large fund, amounting to some fifty thousand dollars or more, raised in New York to help on a "revolution" in Ireland a number of years ago, has been to a considerable extent disposed of according to Judge Emmett of New York city, who is a member of the "Irish Directory," in contriving the escape of Messrs. Meagher, Mitchell, and others from Van Dieman's Land, and the remainder, it has also been stated by Judge Emmett, has been reserved for "future operations."

A great man is one who, in some sense or other, adds to the world's possessions; be it in government, in poetry, or in philosophy, he is a bringer into life—a builder, a creator, a planter, an inventor—in some sort, a doer of that which nobody else has done before him, and which nobody, then, besides himself, seemed willing or prepred to do. Now, it is very certain that the world really loses none of its possessions. A truth once known is known forever.

Severe weather has been experienced on the English coast, during which several shipwrecks are stated to have taken place. Among them we notice the loss of the fine packet ship Niagara, owned by Messrs. Frost & Sons, of this City, and bound to this port. The Niagara was 790 tuns, built by Geo. Greenman, & Co., at Mystic Bridge, Conn., in 1845; was valued at about $40,000, and the cargo about $100,000. Vessel and cargo insured.

The ship Great Republic, recently burned at her dock in New York, has been raised, and proves to be less damaged than was at first supposed. There is talk of repairing her. Of the cargo, only about one third was touched by fire, leaving at least three thousand tuns damaged by water alone.

An infidel remarked, within the hearing of a girl of thirteen, that all things were made by chance; and the world, like a mushroom, sprang up in the night. "I should like to know, sir," she asked, "where the seed came from?"

There is hardly any bodily blemish which a winning behavior will not conceal, or make tolerable; and there is no external grace which ill-nature or affectation will not deform.

Aristotle, being censured for bestowing alms on a bad man, made the following noble reply:—"I did not give it to the man; I gave it to humanity."

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

An extensive application seems also required to that prediction of Isaiah in which, testifying of the sad condition of the world in the last times, and of the dreadful judgments which that condition shall entail, he exclaims, "The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof, because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinances, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate. Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left." Is. xxiv. 5, 6. It is, probably, God's everlasting covenant with Israel that is here referred to as having been broken, His laws given unto them that have been transgressed, and the ordinances of divine appointment which are stated to have been sinfully changed may include the Sabbath they are called to remember to keep it holy. But the climax of the rebellion thus described is also at an advanced epoch of the world's history and of human depravity; and the circumstances described and the consequences involved are not limited to Israel, but seem much more general. "Fear, and the pit, and the snare, are upon thee, O inhabitant of the earth. And it shall come to pass, that he who fleeth from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit; and he that cometh up out of the midst of the pit, shall be taken in the snare, for the windows from on high are open, and the foundations of the earth do shake. The earth is utterly broken down, the earth is clean disolved, the earth is moved exceedingly. The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard, and shall be removed like a cottage; and the transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it; and it shall fall, and not rise again." Ver. 17—20.

But these predictions, while they intimate the very general apostacy of Israel in the last times, and their wickedness in changing God's ordinances, do yet imply, as already observed, that all shall not be participants in the guilt. The Wicked One, the Antichrist—he "who denieth the Father and the Son," arrogating to himself divine honors, and sitting in the temple of God—is indeed seen by the prophet as having "made war with the saints and prevailed against them;" but this implies their resistance to his measures. So also does the fact that he "shall wear out the saints of the Most High," imply the continuance of those saints in their resitance; and if "they shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of time," (or three years and a half,) this farther intimates their continued steadfastness unto the last. (Dan. vii. 21—25.) Those who among the people of Israel thus not only refuse to yield to that apostacy, but even resist it unto the death, will, we infer, have been converted to Christianity—in the full sense of that word—true believers in Jesus as the Messiah promised unto their fathers, having peace with God through Him, and testifying to their brethren, and to all, that they have found Him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write. Glorying in the cross of Christ, they yield not, either to the seductions or to the cruelty of the Man of Sin. Daniel elsewhere states concerning the same period, that, in the strength and cause of the Lord, these faithful witness-bearers will perform wonders; "the people that know their God shall do exploits." Their influence for good shall also be great, for "they that understand among the people shall instruct many." (Dan. xi. 32, 33.)

But the temptations of that awful time will be peculiarly great; "and some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end; because it is yet for a time appointed." (Ver. 35.) And again, "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand." This, the prophet intimates, is descriptive of what shall take place at "the time of the end." (Dan. xii. 9, 10.) The context indicates that this expression is equivalent to that of "the end of the world" or age, the evil condition of which our Lord foretells in His prediction concerning His coming again in glory. (Matt. xxiv. 3, 4.) It is the end of the present dispensation, when Jerusalem shall cease to be "trodden down of the Gentiles." The times of the Gentiles shall then have been fulfilled—the times during which they have been entrusted with the kingdom of God, that they might bring forth fruit, which Israel had failed in doing. But when their time shall have passed, and their unfaithfulness also has been demonstrated, the land of Israel shall revert to those to whom by right of covenant it pertains. Daniel accordingly testifies, that "at that time shall Michael stand up" for Daniel's people; while he, as also our Lord himself, intimates the close relation of this event to a time of unparalleled troubles, the commencement of which now seems to be nigh. (Dan. xii. 1. Matt. xxiv. 21.)

It is not, however, to be assumed, that the purifying and making white of which the prophet speaks, is to be confined to the house of Israel; for when he, in the same prediction, and in reference to the same time, declares that "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," we know from other texts, that at the period of the resurrection spoken of, the glory and blessedness so intimated will not be confined to those of the house of Israel. The prediction is, indeed, here given immediately for the encouragement of the faithful of Daniel's people; but it serves for our consolation also, "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." (Heb. xi. 40.) It is to the same period that the utterances of John's Seventh Trumpet relate, when the voices in heaven proclaim the kingdom of Christ to have come, and give thanks that He has taken to Him his great power to reign, saying, "The nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that Thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to them that fear thy name, small and great,"—for "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as He hath declared to His servants, the prophets." (Rev. xi. 18; x. 7.)

And as thus the time of the resurrection of patriarchs, and prophets, and faithful men of Israel, is the time of the resurrection and reward of all that fear the name of the Lord, small and great, so also may the time of the purifying of many of the house of Israel, be, in like manner, the time of the purifying of many of the Gentile church. This, indeed, appears to be intimated by the same New Testament prophet—and intimated in a manner that encourages us to hope that those so purified of the uncircumcision, as well as of the circumcision, in the time immediately preceding the Millennium, will all observe God's appointed Sabbath. Reverting for a moment to the Old Testament, it may be remembered, that Isaiah pictures Zion as "a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth," but, contemplating again the return of his people to their land, he exclaims, "Who hath heard such a thing? Who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day, or shall a nation be born at once? For as soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children." (Is. liv. 6; lxvi. 8.) So John beheld a woman travailing in birth and ready to be delivered, while a great red dragon, "that serpent called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world," seeks to destroy her child. "And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days," (three years and a half,) in consequence, as it appears, of Michael's standing up for that people, as foretold by Daniel, for "there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon and his angels fought and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven." (Rev. xii. 7—9.) Satan, thus cast out of heaven, is in great wrath against the inhabitants of the earth, "because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." "And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed which keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." (Ver. 10—17.) Those thus described as of the seed of the woman, we believe to be of the house of Israel; "the remnant of her seed" who "have the testimony of Jesus Christ" we regard as those of that people who shall then be believers in the Saviour; while their being described as "the remnant" who do so, seems to imply that the larger number of their brethren shall still be rejecting Christ. But the portion of Israel who "have the testimony of Jesus Christ," and who are fiercely persecuted by Satan, have been "made white," for we thus learn that they "keep the commandments of God." All God's commandments are thus included as being kept by them—the fourth commandment not excepted. And that as well as other of the commandments, being kept in a manner which God thus acknowledges, will be faithfully kept, and, consequently, they will truly hallow the Sabbath which God's commandment enjoins, even that on which God Himself rested from His creation work.

"THE POOR DOTARD."

An English paper makes the following statements, which show at once the profoundness of Sir Isaac Newton's views, as also the shallowness and malignity of the man who "despised prophesyings."

"Sir Isaac Newton wrote a work upon the prophet Daniel, and another upon the book of Revelations, in one of which he said that in order to fulfill certain prophesis before a certain date was terminated, viz: 1260 years, there should be a mode of traveling of which the men of his time had no conception; nay, that the knowledge of mankind would be so increased that they would be able to travel at the rate of fifty miles an hour. Voltaire, who did not believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures, got hold of this and said: 'Now look at the mighty mind of Newton, who discovered gravity, and told such marvels for us all to admire. When he became an old man, and got into his dotage, he began to study that book called the Bible; and it seems that, in order to credit his fabulous nonsense, we must believe that the knowledge of mankind will be so increased that we shall be able to travel at the rate of fifty miles an hour. The poor dotard!' exclaimed the philosophic infidel, Voltaire, in the self-complacency of his pity. But who is the dotard now?"

DR. JUDSON'S PILLOW.

☞ During a part of his imprisonment, Dr. Judson contrived to keep possession of an old hard pillow covered with a mat. It was the only comfortable support of his weary, aching head. When he was thrust into the inner prison at Ava, it was taken from him by the keeper, but the keeper found it an uneasy support for his brains, and finding a better one, it was returned.

On the day when he was driven away to Oung-pen-la, he was robbed again of clothes and bedding. One of the ruffians seized the pillow, untied the mat which covered it, and threw the apparently worthless roll of hard cotton away. Moung Ing, one of the disciples, a few hours after, found it, and preserved it as the sole relic of his imprisoned teacher. Some months after, when Dr. Judson was released, the old pillow was hunted up, opened, and within it was found a manuscript, which is now printed as a portion of the Burmese Bible. It is no wonder that Dr. Judson desired to lay his head upon it, nor that the keeper found it an uneasy support.

MUSINGS.

I have mingled in the circle
Of the gay and brilliant throng,
And my voice with theirs has blended,
In the mirthful choral song;
Misty mazes I have threaded
Of the music measured dance,
Sought the goddess queen of pleasure,
And have gloried in her glance.

Paths of "pleasure" I have traversed,
Knelt and worshiped at her shrine,
Worn the gaudy glowing wreathlet,
Which her rosy fingers twine;
Bowed before her gilded altars,
Reveled in her banquet halls,
Drinking at her pearly fountains,
And her flashing waterfalls.

Subtle fragrance there inhaling,
Of her deadly poisoned flowers;
I have found the death-sting hidden,
In her fountains and her bowers.
Transient happiness they yielded—
All has vanished at a breath;
Left my heart all seared and blighted
In the bitter gall of death.

Strewn with wrecks of crumbled altars
Is the life-path I have trod;
Down the past are thickly scattered
Broken covenants with God;
Much of life's glad morning wasted,
Seeking earth's unhallowed bliss,
Worldly pleasures—phantom shadows—
Fading out in gloominess.

But in Christ is found a fullness,
Of an overflowing joy—
Pure, unsullied, stainless pleasure,
Happiness without alloy;
Quaffing now from purest fountains,
Welling up within the soul—
From the springs of Life Eternal,
Peace immersing wavelets roll.

Flowers fadeless and immortal,
Fair and fragrant, ever bloom,
Filling souls God's love possessing,
With their incense and perfume.
Purer bliss than worldly pleasure,
May be drawn from God on high;
Richer far than earthly treasure,
Are the treasures of the sky.

Wealth immortal may be garnered,
In the light of endless day;
Deathless riches—joy supernal—
Wealth that fadeth not away.
To the souls which grace enlightens,
Rich inheritance is given,
Where eternal ages brighten,
In the blissful realms of Heaven. ELLIS.

PLAINFIELD, Jan. 12, 1854.

REALITIES OF CHINESE LIFE.

An interesting lecture on this subject was delivered before the Episcopal Mutual Benefit Society of New York, on the evening of January 10th, by Rev. Mr. Syle, of the Episcopal Mission at Shanghae, China. We copy from the N. Y. Tribune the principal part of a report of it:—

The speaker, who since 1845 has been stationed as a missionary at Shanghae, spoke of the change which has taken place in the amount of general knowledge upon China, and of the fact that regular advices from that country now appear in our newspapers, instead of the tales and sketches, ludicrous and grotesque, which once formed the staple of their Chinese matter. The country was described as truly magnificent, nearly as large as the United States, containing 300,000,000 people, nearly a third of the earth's population, under the rule of the longest established government in existence, speaking, or rather using a common language, jealous and exclusive in their intercourse with other nations.

The treaty of 1842, at the close of the Opium War, opened five ports to foreign intercourse. Other treaties with France and the United States followed. From that time China was open to the establishment of Christian Missions, and he (the speaker) went out. His lecture, therefore, would be the simple lessons taught by his own observation and experience.

He then spoke first of the Government: The Emperor, at Pekin, is absolute; beneath him eighteen Governors, or rather Satraps, as they correspond almost precisely to those ancient Persian dignitaries, rule the eighteen Provinces; below whom, in turn, are the various orders of Mandarins. There is no Legislative body whatever. If in any Province some new law is needed, a Satrap sends in a petition to that effect to the Emperor, which is referred to the Board or Bureau, and, if approved of, a single word to that effect written upon it gives it legal force, and it is sent back to the Satrap whence it came, who receives it and puts it in execution, when it is his good pleasure so to do. All officers of Government receive their appointment directly from the Emperor, and are dependent upon him. There is nothing which in any case resembles election—no hereditary nobility—no Mandarin holds office in his native place, but every office-holder, down to the meanest constable, is from some other place or Province than that in which he acts—hence there can be no sympathy between a public functionary and the people among whom he dwells, a strong esprit du corps taking its place, and separating the new official completely from his fellow men.

Again, every public officer in China is responsible for any breach of the laws within the limits of his authority, and whether constable or Satrap is liable to punishment and loss of office in case his vigilance is insufficient to prevent crime. Consequently, it is the interest of officials to conceal all breaches of the law. The constable hushes up a crime if he can; if not, his superior does, and his superior in turn, and so on. Again, the entire Government is carried on by a system of checks and espoinage—for instance, there are five chief Mandarins in Shanghae, each a spy upon the others. When a Commissioner is sent from Pekin to any particular province, a spy is attached to his train. The first thing done on reaching the place of destination, therefore, is for Plenipotentiary and spy to come to a good understanding, read each other's letters, make all proper discrepancies in them to hide the collusion, and then share the spoils. So it is with the army, and in all public stations.

A ludicrous picture was drawn of the Chinese army, whose officers use the men's wages as their salaries, the men themselves being obliged to support life by their labor. A case was mentioned where the Chinese fortified themselves at the foot of a hill, and when the British troops flanked them and appeared at the top, the Chinese Commander complained that his enemies did not fight according to rule. On another occasion, in a night retreat, each soldier as he fled up a rising ground carried a lantern! The speaker was once in danger upon the river. Two batteries, mounting some hundreds of cannon, fired at a floating target of some 15 feet diameter. The target was uninjured, but boats at a distance hardly escaped.

In the administration of the laws there is no oral examination of witnessess, all proceedings being carried on by written pleadings, but criminals are sometimes examined by torture. Whoever has any thing to do with law rues it, be he in the right or wrong. Hence various devices to settle quarrels without resorting to the tribunals. A common mode is, for two litigants to enter a tea-room, and call upon the assembled visitors to act as a Jury, the litigants paying for the tea drank during the trial. The case is soon decided, as the longer the process the greater the expense. Foreigners are considered fair game. The carpenter, who was at work on the Bishop's house, was cast into prison, on some frivolous charge, with the expectation of extorting money from the missionaries for his release. Mr. Syle called upon the authorities, having with some difficulty obtained through the American Consul permission to do so. Immediate help was promised—but the help which the poor man obtained was fifty blows for appealing to a foreigner—so well laid on that death ensued.

Another case was detailed in which Dr. Medhurst and two companions were attacked and beaten, when distributing tracts, by certain boatmen. Nothing but the firmness of the British Consul, who blockaded the Pekin grain junks, finally brought the criminals to punishment.

The oppression under which the common people live was depicted in lively colors, and some cases in point related. The Chinese medical practice was described in its various forms, and reference made to a treatise on the the pulse, by a native physician. They have no surgery. In local diseases they have considerable skill.

It appeared from the account given, that the public charities of the Chinese are by no means contemptible, either in number or extent. By one at Shanghae the dead are buried, the poor clothed, medicine and medical advice given, bridges built, lanterns placed in the streets, &c. There is a Humane Society for saving drowning persons; a Foundling Hospital, which saves many children, parents having the right of infanticide and actually practicing it. For instance, a nurse in the family of the speaker had destroyed her own child. A sad picture of the effects of famine and floods was drawn, and the modes of ameliorating the condition of the sufferers described.

In speaking of their religion, the system of Confucius was described as a cold and heartless stoicism, leading to Pantheism or Atheism. This is the State religion. About the time of the Christian era a commission was sent west to learn about the advent of the greater teacher, of whom, by some means, a tradition existed in China. This commission went no further than India, and carried back Boodhism, which, as it has some heart in it, is the best form of religion for the people of China. It is curious that this resembles Romanism in its rites and ceremonies.

Funeral ceremonies were described, many of which are founded upon a belief in Metempsychosis. Mr. Syle gave some instances of this belief. An old beggar supposed he was born blind because in a former state of existence he was a thief, robber or murderer. An Albino servant was supposed by his fellow-servant to have been a sheep; a young man purchased an ox, and carefully tended and fed him until he died, having been told that the soul of his father was in that animal. The effect of this belief is extremely degrading and ruinous to all higher aspirations. The worship of ancestors, the universal idolatry, the politeness of the people—equal if not superior to that of the French—deference to age, marriage, some points in the life of the Chinese merchants, and the language written and spoken, were successively touched upon.

In speaking of the education of males, he stated that after passing successfully the first examination, they take a degree which exempts them from punishment by the civil authorities. A second degree makes a man eligible to office. A few years since, certain candidates for the second degree, finding that these degrees were purchasable, and coming at the same time under the influence of missionaries, raturned home angry with the Government, but impressed with the missionary doctrines. Certain tracts which they took with them, and intercourse with the late Dr. Gutzlaff, had also their due effect. They organized a secret society, which in spite of the Mandarins spread and flourished; arms were taken up, a form of religion promulgated—the same which has been reported in the papers—the leading point being that there is one God—and this was the beginning of the present extraordinary rebellion. The hatred of idolatry is a marked feature in the principles of the new party, and no discrimination is made between the idols in the pagan temples and the images in the chapels of the Catholic missions.

The lecturer closed with some remarks upon the singular spectacle presented by the oldest and by the youngest nations of the world—China and the United States—being brought by the order of providence into contact, and upon the opening now presented for missionary enterprise.

GOODNESS OF GOD.—The silk-work cannot furnish silk without the mulberry leaf, the substance on which it feeds; and God, as if to allow the little spinner plenty of stuff to work with, has so ordered it that no other insect will eat of the same food. This may appear a small matter, yet it shows the care and the goodness which the great Maker of all exercises over the humblest of His creatures. We may well say, if He thus provides food, and makes useful the little silk-worm, so will He also do for me, little as I may be.

WHAT A DYING MAN SAID TO A FRIEND.

Lavater mentions the last visit he paid to his most intimate friend. All present having left the room, the dying man said:—

Let me tell you in a few words that I have not led the life of a Christian. I have not been a hypocrite—not what the world calls a hypocrite; but I have not been a Christian. And I trust you will thank me in the next world for this wound I must inflict on your heart. We have not been Christian friends. The love of Jesus has not dwelt in us. Our friendship was not founded on Him. How many hundred hours of our short life have we killed by useless conversation, with plans of ambition! What the world calls noble ambition is abominable in the sight of God; an ever destroying poison to the soul; a bane to all virtue; a hell to the heart which perceives it is at the gates of death, which begins to be sensible of the eternity of God, of Christ's unspeakable majesty, and His incomparable humility. O my friend! that passion has caused me a thousand burning tears of unutterable grief. Unspeakably have I been afflicted by every impulse of that monster, now I am on the brink of eternity. O how heavenly true are those words of my Saviour, 'Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased!' Jesus Christ was humility itself. It is enough that the disciple be as his Lord. O friend! heaven and earth shall pass away, but not the words of Christ. How my best actions dwindle away on the brink of the grave! How horribly are my faults and foibles, which I formerly thought little, towering up! Alas, how little do we know ourselves, though the bustle of life be ever so gentle! O, how dreadful is the stillness of death! how terrible the heavy load of our own heart! Creator! Father! What name shall I give to Thy mercy, which will forgive forever those enormous acts of thoughtlessness; and destroy, through Jesus Christ, all the bad consequences they produced to me and others? THOU ART—YES! THOU ART—LOVE.'

BUSINESS QUALITIES OF GODLINESS.

Religion cannot be said to impart either aptitude or habits suited to professional or mercantile life; but it does provide a foundation of qualities suited to business, upon which aptitudes and habits may be easily built, and without which these usually fail. Godliness warrants a man's integrity. Honesty of purpose and justice in dealing, gain friends everywhere, and make a sure success. Where integrity is a partner, depend upon it men will gather around the firm. Where honesty practices, depend upon it the best clients and the most desirable patients will throng. Profits often come in more slowly than where no scruples interfere with taking advantage of ignorance, or folly, or credulity; but those profits bring a blessing with them; you can use them without regret, and cheerfully, with a safe conscience.

Godliness warrants a man's rectitude. The godly man refers every action to the law of Christ. Having a fixed standard of character, or a constant rule of conduct, applicable to every case, a standard and a rule which are not affected by passion or interest, he exhibits a refreshing consistency and uniform rectitude. Fraud or deceit, even in their lighter forms of speculation, overreachings, pettifogging, or quackery, do not stain his garments. Open, straightforward, right dealing, gives him character. And this is the safe and prosperous rule of business. Expediency succeeds sometimes; rectitude always. Expediency very frequently runs faster, but rectitude always wins the race; for expediency is as sure to stumble as rectitude is to stand upright to the end. Godliness then possesses this great practical advantage; it always knows whether plans, speculations, experiments, advice, or gratifications, are essentially right; and he who bears the character of always being in the right, and always doing right, is sure to be a profitable friend, and a profiting man.

Godliness gives a man decision and firmness. Whilst struggling with his own evil heart, and gaining victories over himself, determination of mind, fixedness of purpose, and unwavering perseverance, are largely called into exercise. These qualities are readily applied to the circumstances of our eternal life. Indeed, it is less difficult to be firm and decided in dealing with other men, than in contending with yourselves. There is the strongest probability, therefore, that a religious man, who, in the conduct of his spiritual life, is accustomed to cultivate decision and firmness, will excel in them.

Godliness gives a man forethought. It accustoms him to look beyond the present, to weigh promises and hopes, to compare the value of the seen and the unseen, to calculate probabilities, and to act with strict anticipation of what has not yet been realized. This is forethought; a quality inestimable in the daily adventures of life. On this foundation prudence and discretion are built. Forethought is the same quality, whether it be applied to religion or to business; it will certainly prove profitable in conducting worldly affairs.

Godliness renders a man industrious. "Not slothful in business," is a law of our religion, extending to every station in society. It is equally demanded by prudence; for it is a proverb of Christianity, that idle hands are the devil's workmen. A true servant of God is sure to be found always occupied conscientiously in the work which God has given him to do. Who does not know that industry is the surest introduction to general confidence? As the sweets of the flower-cup are reserved for the early morning bee, so success waits upon professional or business industry. They fare badly who hunt the garden for honey after the sun is up; and they who are wanting in earnestness and fidelity to their occupation, find but indifferent patrons, poor clients, and customers who have more credit than gold. These are elements of a good business character—industry, forethought, decision and firmness, rectitude and integrity. With such a capital, even without any adventitious advantages, a man can make his way profitably through the world. If, in addition, he should possess a moderate share of common sense, and enjoy an opportunity for practice, under all ordinary circumstances they will secure to him abundant success. Such are the men whom good fortune does not spoil. Such are the qualities which, combining with wealth, or station, or influence, render men prominent and useful.

The elements of character we have now pointed out as the possession of a godly man, are these which you desire in a partner of business; to those you give confidence, and intrust your interests in professional life; with such a character you choose to deal, and this is the one who secures your esteem and affection. This character other men may sometimes exhibit in parts; the godly man alone holds it in harmony and entireness. This character other men hold at hazard; because, not being based on religious principles, and upheld by divine grace, it is subject to change, and liable to the shock of temptation; but the godly man holds it securely, exhibits it constantly, and possesses it as his right from God. [Rev. G. T. Bedell.

AN INCIDENT IN THE MOUNTAINS.

"Irenæus," of the New York Observer, closes a letter from the mountains of Switzerland with the following incident of "Heinrich," a young German friend, of well-cultivated mind, but on the subject of religion still astray in the darkness and mysticism of German philosophy:—

We could now look down into the valley of the Grimsel, a little valley, but like an immense cauldron, the sides of which are sterile, naked rocks, 800 feet high! On the west they stand like the walls and towers of a fortified city, and in the bottom of the vale is a single house and a small lake; but a flock of 100 goats and a score of cows, with their tinkling bells, are picking a scanty sustenance among the stones. The scene was wild, savage, grand indeed, and had there been no sun to light it up with the luster of heaven, it would have been dreary and dismal. Heinrich had been very thoughtful for an hour. He had discovered that my thoughts turned constantly to the God who made all these mountains, while he was ever studying the mountains themselves. He sat down on a rock and said,

"Here I will commune with nature."

I replied, "And I will go on a little farther and commune with God!"

"Stay," he cried, "I will go with you."

"But you cannot see him," I said; "I see him in the mountain, and the glacier, and the flower; I hear him in the torrent, and the still small voice of the rills and little waterfalls that are warbling ever in our ears. I feel his presence, and something of his power. I beg you to stay and commune with nature, while I go and commune with God."

I left him and wandered off alone, and in an hour went down the mountain, and to my chamber in the hospice. I was sitting on the bedside, arranging the flowers I had gathered during the day, when Heinrich entered, and giving me his hand said to me, "I wish you would speak more to me of God!"

He sat down by my side, and I asked him if he believed the Bible to be the Word of God.

He said he did, but he would examine it by the light of history and reason, and reject what he did not find to be true.

"And do you believe that the soul of man will live hereafter in happiness or woe?"

"I doubt," was his desponding answer.

I then addressed him tenderly: "My dear young friend, I have loved you since the hour I met you at Altorf. And now tell me, with all your studies have you yet learned how to die? You doubt, but are you so well satisfied with your philosophy that you are able to look on death among the mountains, or by the lightning, without fear? My faith tells me that when I die my life and joy will just begin, and go on in glory for ever. This is the source of all my hopes, and it gives me comfort now, when I think that I may never see my native land and those I love on earth again. I know that in another land we shall meet."

"How do you know that you shall meet?"

"My faith, my heart, my Bible tell me so. I shall meet all the good in heaven. I am sure of one child, an angel now."

"And where are your children?"

"Four in America, and one in heaven. I had a boy four years ago; earth never had a fairer. His locks were of gold, and hung in rich curls on a neck and shoulders whiter than the snow; his brow was high and broad like an infant cherub's; his eye was blue as the evening sky; and he was lovelier than he was fair. But in the budding of his beauty, he fell sick and died."

"Oh no, not died!"

"Yes, he died here by my heart. And that child is the only one of mine that I am sure of ever seeing again."

"I do not understand you."

"If my other children grow up to doubt as you doubt, they may wander away on the mountains of error or the glaciers of vice, and fall into some awful gulph and be lost forever. And if I do not live to see my living children, I am as sure of meeting that one, now in heaven, as if I saw him here in the light of the setting sun. Heinrich! have you a mother, my dear friend?"

"Yes, yes," he cried, "and her faith is the same as yours."

I had seen his eyes filling, and had felt my own lips quivering as I spoke, but now he burst into tears and fell on my breast. He kissed my lips, and my cheeks, and my forehead, and the hot tears rained on my face, and mingled with my own. "Oh, teach me the way to feel and believe," he said at last, as he clung to me like a frightened child, and clasped me convulsively to his heart. I held him long and tenderly, and felt for him somewhat, I hope, as Jesus did for the young man who came to Him with a similar inquiry. I loved him, and longed to lead him to the light of day.

He has left the company with which he was traveling, has joined himself to me with a fondness of affection strange as it is delightful, and has written home for leave to go with me into the Holy Land.

IMPARTING AND RECEIVING.

It is the disposition of unrenewed men to live altogether for their own gratification. It ought not to be so with the Christian. The Great Sacrifice was offered, "that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again." Why is it, that the professed disciples of Him, who never sought his own comfort as long as he was on earth, will, in spite of all the obligations of their religion, live as if the principal thing to be considered was self-enjoyment? Do they think, that they can render themselves happy in a course which constantly violates the dictates of conscience?

One way in which Christians manifest this censurable disposition, is by shifting about from place to place, because the state of things where they are does not happen to suit them. Acting upon the principle that they must be the recipients of happiness, rather than the agents of communicating it to others, they seek a society already molded and fitted to their taste. Such as have enjoyed some degree of culture in early life, or have been brought up in circles elevated above the rude mass, are horror-stricken at the idea of spending their days among those whom they consider but ill adapted to minister to their enjoyment. They must find companions among the more refined. And if Providence cast their lot unavoidably among the vulgar, they not only repine in secret, but are careful to lose no opportunity of giving their neighbors to understand how greatly they long for a society more congenial to them. Or, if they are able to keep their dissatisfaction in some measure to themselves, they show a wonderful skill in making their neighbors feel what great condescension it is in them to come down, and act the friendly part. Now we would whisper a word or two to such persons.

Did not Christ say, "It is more blessed to give than to receive?" And when he said this, his reference was not merely to the bestowment of charity upon the poor, but to all the acts of our life which bear upon the condition of others around us. In this view, you are to regard yourselves as not set up to be the recipients of favors from your associates, but rather as the appointed dispensers of good to them. If you have been favored with a good education, or with that refined culture which places you above those who have been less favored, it is that you may lay yourselves out for their benefit. And instead of fretting because society around you is too coarse for you to enjoy, your duty is to do all in your power to improve it. In so doing, you would soon find yourselves far more happy than it is possible for those to be who live merely to be made happy by others. If your neighbors are ignorant, endeavor to instruct them. If their manners are coarse and offensive, endeavor to refine them. If they are perishing in their sins, try to show them the way of salvation. Thus will you fulfill the end of your existence, and have the satisfaction of knowing that you have added to others' happiness, as well as to your own.

But be careful that you do it in a right manner. For your manner of doing it might be so exceptionable as to defeat the whole object. You must do it without seeming to do it. You must never let those for whom you labor have a suspicion that you consider yourselves above them. If you would polish their manners, you must do it more by the silent force of example, than by any direct inculcation of what they ought to practice. If you would instruct them in knowledge, let it be done in meekness, and without manifesting any overweening confidence in your own views. If duty call you to reprove them for sin, do it tenderly, making them feel that you love them.

Now, if the lot of a Christian is cast among a people to whom it is in his power to render himself useful, he has all the facilities for becoming happy—all he can have in this sincursed world. If he change his situation, it should be done, not for the sake of finding things more to his mind, but that he may have an enlarged field of usefulness. Things will never be exactly to his mind. There are annoyances everywhere. Whoever undertakes to flee from them will have to go out of the world.

But suppose he should find somewhere a condition of society well suited to his taste, how did it become so? Whose agency was concerned, under God, in making it so desirable? Their's whose hearts were set upon giving rather than receiving. Those who did not look upon themselves as born to be ministered to by all the world, labored, toiled, and refined the people that were once rude. But remember, O selfish man, they did not labor and toil, that they might get in readiness a society for your exclusive pleasure. And are you so thoughtless—so unmindful of duty to God and your fellow creatures—that you cannot feel willing to do something in turn to bless others?

Dr. Nott, President of Union College, preached in New York on Sunday evening last, to a large congregation. His text was, "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

MORE TIDINGS FROM CHINA.

[The communication of Bro. Wardner, which we printed last week, referred for additional particulars to a letter previously forwarded by Bro. Carpenter. That letter has since come to hand, and we copy such parts of it as are of general interest.]

Shanghae, Oct. 13, 1853.

We have already said something about the insurrection of the 7th of September. This, like that at Amoy, is local. But notwithstanding these insurgents seem to be entirely indifferent to the religion of the Quang-Se revolutionists, there is evidence that they, for mere political purposes, are seeking a connection, of some sort, with them. I do not think that they ever sent my communication to Nankin. It was too large, after all my efforts to make it small. After I had given it to them, I learned that they made their own letter so small that the bearer, in case he should meet with a severe examination from the imperialists on the route, could swallow it without inconvenience. A foreigner, without the knowledge or consent of his Consul, lately undertook the hazardous work of bearing a letter from the Shanghae insurgents to the Quang-Se revolutionists at Chung-Keang, near Nankin, but he was intercepted and made prisoner, and had it not been for the intervention of other foreigners, who are in the Emperor's service, he would doubtless have lost his head immediately.

The Shanghae insurgents keep very good order in the city. We remained at our place until the 29th of September. On that day, the city gates were closed, in consequence of the approach of the Imperial army. Thinking it would be unpleasant to be shut up there for a period indefinite, we thought best to come out, and had previously looked out a place of refuge. The next day I went back, carrying a note from our Consul as a passport, to get out more of our clothing; for the day before I could not find coolies enough to carry all, and so our winter clothing was nearly all left behind. I got my things to the city gate, but could not pass that day. The day following the city was cannonaded from the river, the first earnest attack on that side. I remained at our house, and for the first time in my life found myself in the midst of flying cannon balls. Do not suppose I was alarmed, for I was not. The walls of our house afforded a sufficient protection. Great numbers, however, of balls came whizzing over and round about us. But I could not judge of the size of them until one came in at one of our windows. That was about two pounds weight. It demolished a table, and then went against the wall, and left a deep dent on it. The fighting ceased at about one o'clock P. M. And at about five o'clock, I was able to make my escape from the city, but brought out only very little with me. I left Lee-Chong, our cook, with provisions enough to last two months or more, not knowing when I should see him again. He was in good spirits, trusting in God for safety.

The Imperialists have made several attacks since that, and on different sides of the city. One more ball came into our house at the same window, as I learn. My health not having been very good for the last few days, I have made but one attempt to enter the city since I left on the 1st inst. That was in company with several other missionaries, and proved a failure.

This morning, while I am writing, they have commenced their cannonading again from the river. All the foreign community are thoroughly disgusted with the Imperialists' mode of warfare. They are too great cowards to fight, except at too great distance to do anything effectually. From the river every ball goes over the heads of their enemies, and falls somewhere to annoy their own people, whom they came to save, in the city. Their attacks by land on the north and west sides of the city are equally ineffectual. They generally approach under the cover of night, a little before day, and taking shelter behind grave mounds or some buildings, they fire away random shots, and when the insurgents open upon them from the wall, they soon retire. A few days since, from a house-top, I saw the Imperialists in great numbers approaching the city. This was not in the night. It was about nine o'clock A. M. on the 7th inst. The multitude, with their numerous banners, in single file, winding along the narrow footpaths through the country, could be seen scattered over a large tract of country. But almost as soon as the enemy from the city wall opened a few cannon upon them, they right about face, and the whole line, their banners waving in the breeze, were seen slowly retreating. What success they reported to the Emperor that day, I have not yet heard. But they are not so harmless upon the poor people scattered about in little hamlets all over the country, whose property they are constantly pillaging. Those who are traveling about fare no better. If the soldiers fall in with them, they take away their money, if they have any, and other effects.

The battle is in progress to day on the east, north, and west sides of the city. I have just heard that if the military leader of the imperial forces here, does not take the city to-day, to-morrow, or next day, he will lose his head, he being considered as the guily one, of course. The degrading or otherwise punishing of officers in case of failure has been the order of the day all along.

Agreeably to instructions from our Commissioner, I have taken an inventory of the property in my charge, to which two witnesses have testified, so that in case of loss we may seek indemnification. The house and chapel, including out-houses, are valued at $2,500. The other property, including chapel bell and desk and benches, amounts to about $1,100.

Not being able to take out our winter clothing, I have already been subjected to some extra expense, and unless I shall yet succeed in obtaining access to the city, there will be more expense of this sort. We are not without hope, that the Chinese revolutionists will soon be here, and restore peace and order, sweep away the idols, and allow us to enter the interior of the country. There is some ground to believe that Pekin has already fallen, and that the conquerors are on their way to Suchu; then Shanghae would follow as a matter of course. May He who is over all speed their way to this place.

Yours in Christ, S. Carpenter.

REVEREND.

This word is found once in the Bible, and only applied to the name of the Lord—(Ps. cxi. 9)—"Holy and reverend is his name."

Now, to take this name, and give it to any man, appears to me to be not only idolatry, but also taking the name of the Lord our God in vain, if not even blasphemy. We read of a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy," Rev. xvii. 3. And does not this mean some who apply to themselves the names of the Most High?

Though ministers, or elders, or any other officers in the church, or in the state, should be honored and respected according to their station and worth, yet I would most respectfully and most earnestly request all Protestants to leave this species of idolatry entirely to those who love to worship "His Holiness" the Pope of Rome, their "Right Reverend Father in God," with other such "names of blasphemy!"

If our New Testament was filled up with the Rev. Dr. Matthew, the Rev. Dr. Mark, the Rev. Luke, the Rev. John, the Rev. Peter, the Rev. Paul, the Rev. Titus, &c., as full as some religious books and newspapers are, I would not object to giving such "flattering titles unto man." See Job xxxii. 21, 22.

Again, if our blessed Saviour refused to be called "Good Master," because that title belonged only to God, (Mark x. 17,) and if one who showed many things to John, said to him, "See thou do it not," when John was about to worship him, (Rev. xxii. 8, 9,) then ought not every minister or elder to refuse to be called Reverend, because that title belongs only to God?

Would it not be as well, and as proper, for religious writers and editors to omit the "Rev.," and insert Eld., when speaking of religious ministers? As for myself, I should think it as right, and as proper, to bow down and pray to any man, as to call him Reverend.

GREAT RESULTS FROM SMALL BEGINNINGS.

While I glanced with interest over the notice of the late revival in the Friendship Church, which may be found in the Recorder of the 5th inst., I thought that perhaps the same class of readers who were interested in that notice would be equally interested in becoming acquainted with some of the incidents connected with the revival. * * *

Some hundreds of miles from this, in the latter part of the past summer, a little girl of ten years arose from her bed, in the dead of night, and repaired to that of her parents, and requested her father to pray for her. Upon his refusal, she made the same request to her mother, which was immediately complied with. She sought, and, according to the promise, found Christ "the one altogether lovely, and the chief among ten thousand."

The little disciple, like any true follower of Christ, immediately cast about for a field of usefulness, which she next day found in school among her mates. Through her influence, prayer-meetings were held in the grove, or any convenient place, during recesses and noon-spells, until the growing anxiety of her associates and others to become acquainted with Christ, made it necessary to have their meetings in the school-house. Here the words of life and truth were dispensed on many successive evenings, until a goodly number were converted from the error of their ways.

At this time a sister from Friendship was teaching, some three miles from the above meetings, who made it in her way to attend two of them. The truth found way to her heart, and she sought and obtained a hope in Christ. On returning to her home in Friendship, she made her determinations and anxieties known to her mother, who, by the way, has since my earliest recollections ever been a mother in Israel. Such a child, from such a mother, at such a time, could only receive good advice. This she thankfully accepted, and immediately wrote brief notes to her former associates, stating that at a certain time she would call upon them, have a religious talk, and, if agreeable to their feelings, pray with them. These appointments were punctually fulfilled, and her religious influence was soon not only felt in those families, but in the weekly prayer-meetings of the church. Thus a number were brought to see their perishing condition without a hope in Christ. * * *

At this stage of religious interest, casually passing through the place, I called. The awakening manifested in the prayer-meetings, as was very natural, was the principal theme of remark. The impression was prevalent, that the providence of God was pointing to the present as a time to gather a harvest of souls. Being earnestly solicited to "come over and help," I determined, as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made, to do so. Oct. 2d, about two weeks after, I returned and spent the Sabbath, and before leaving had the pleasure of hearing a number declare their faith in the Saviour. From this time until the first of January, I spent a portion of nearly every week in the work; in which Eld. B. F. Robbins took part as far as his health would permit. The Adversary, seeing his kingdom likely to take damage, at an early period, strenuously remonstrated, so disturbing the moral elements as to darken the horizon with portentous clouds. Yet, the work progressed, and we were permitted to witness the demonstration of the saving power of the Gospel. Many of the incidents connected with the revival possessed a peculiar interest. * * *

To what little girl of ten years shall we look for an example like the above? In the darkness of the night, while others slept, she was wakeful and sleepless; her comparatively small sins drove slumber from her eyes, and conviction to her heart; and in the agony of her soul she arose, waked her slumbering father, and asked him to pray that an offended God would pardon his offending little child. Though negatived in this purpose, she was not discouraged, as many of more years would have been. Her perseverance (in the hands of the All-wise) has, in less than six months, resulted in the conversion of many precious souls, that I trust may shine in the crown of her rejoicing. Did not this child preach the gospel? If any of the readers of the Recorder are at a loss to understand the true meaning of the recent editorials upon the necessity of every one's preaching the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are referred to the preaching of the two sisters mentioned in this article.

OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

The Committee on Outfit have learned that the vessel which was to have sailed in ten or twelve days, as noticed last week, sailed a few days since—ten days sooner than was expected by the owners. Bro. Saunders reports the vessel as small and uncomfortable. The loss of the opportunity is therefore the less to be regretted.

There are two barks daily expected to arrive in Boston, of about eight hundred tons burden, having fine accommodations. They will be laden immediately on their arrival, and will probably sail within a week of that time. It will therefore, no doubt, be thought advisable by the Committee to have our missionaries proceed as far as Westerly this week, and wait there, so as to take the first practicable chance offered by one of these ships.

It will be seen, that no time should be lost in forwarding to the care of Charles Saunders, Westerly, R. I., whatever goods or utensils may be intended for them to carry with them.

Slavery in Congress.—There is before Congress a bill in relation to the territory of Nebraska, which includes a project to repeal that section of the Missouri Compromise which forever prohibits slavery in the territories lying north of 36 degrees and 30 minutes. The project meets with strong opposition from some even who favored the Compromise Measures of 1850. Its triumph would be a signal and lamentable triumph of Slavery,

BAPTIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

Several months ago we announced the organization, at Philadelphia, of a Baptist Historical Society. We have now to acknowledge the receipt of a Circular from the Secretary, Horatio G. Jones, Jr., setting forth the origin and objects of that Society. A brief extract will explain:—

At the last Anniversary of "The American Baptist Publication Society," held in the City of Philadelphia, an Historical Department was formed, under the name of "The American Baptist Historical Society." The Officers of the Historical Department are to be annually appointed by the Publication Society—and a Report is to be presented to that body every year by the Curators.

The objects of the Historical Department may be briefly summed up as follows:—

It is designed to collect all manuscripts, pamphlets, books and facts which relate to the early history of the Baptists; to obtain histories of individual Ministers and Churches; Books, Sermons, Essays, &c., written by Baptists, and Minutes of Associations, Reports of our Benevolent Societies, Histories and Catalogues of Baptist Colleges and Libraries; Newspapers, Periodicals, and in fact anything that relates to the History and Progress of our Churches from the earliest to the present time.

It is not intended to confine the operations of the Society to any particular section of the country, but it is designed to render it National in its character, and to this end we ask the co-operation of all American Baptists.

The Board of Curators, in the election of Corresponding Members, have chosen two at least from the seventh-day branch of the Baptist Denomination—Wm. M. Fahnestock of Bordentown, N. J., and Geo. B. Utter of New York—thus showing an intention to make the Society really, as it is nominally, "national in its character." We shall take pleasure in rendering it all the assistance in our power.

Revival in Oregon.—Rev. E. Fisher, an Exploring Agent of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, writes from the scene of a protracted meeting and revival in Oregon, as follows:—

The meeting had been in progress for six days, conducted by Elder Chandler, and assisted by Elder Sperry. The evening of my arrival an interesting young man professed a hope in Christ, some few backsliders had returned to their first love with penitence, and the church was truly revived. The interest of the meeting daily increased, till, on Sabbath, Brother Chandler baptized three interesting young persons, among whom was a young married lady from Holland, who could speak but broken English. She had been a member of the Presbyterian church, and expressed such strong confidence in God, and such endearing attachment to her Bible, as sent a sensation of sympathy through the congregation. She exclaimed, in broken accents, yet with an eloquence which seemed more than earthly, 'My dear, blessed Bible, that precious Bible, I do love to read it every day! It is not like your book,' (referring to the English translation.) All the services of the Sabbath were deeply solemn. On Monday evening nine persons, mostly children of the members of the church, found peace in believing. On Wednesday following, Brother Sperry and I baptized nine persons in the waters of the Callipoosa river, among whom was a Presbyterian brother and his wife. I was obliged to leave that evening, yet numbers were still inquiring where they might find ease for their troubled conscience.

Revivals among Baptists.—We clip from the Christian Watchman and Reflector the following notices of revivals among Baptist Churches in different parts of the country:—

A friend writes to us under date of Jan. 3d: "The Lippitt and Phœnix (R. I.) Baptist church, under the pastoral labors of the Rev. P. T. Hedden, is signally favored with a glorious revival of religion. In all our experience of revivals in churches, the writer has never before known a church so generally revived as this is at the present time. It is no uncommon thing for fifty or more to take an active part in a social conference meeting. Backsliders are coming home, and are confessing their sins, while many young converts are rejoicing in the love of Christ."

The Christian Index states that 33 candidates were received for baptism by a church not named, in Union county, Ga., and 18 were received at Lathonia church, Georgia.

Missionary Contributions of Boston Churches.—The Congregational Churches of Boston have a missionary meeting and collection on the first Sunday evening of each year. The following list shows the contributions this year of some of the largest churches to the funds of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions:—

Mount Vernon church,	$5,080 10
Essex Street church,	4,368 90
Park Street church,	3,336 78
Old South church,	3,150 12
Central church,	2,829 40
Bowdoin Street church,	2,768 94
Salem Street church,	1,029 30
Phillips church, in South Boston,	574 50
Shawmut church,	500 00
Maverick church, East Boston,	485 19

Testimony from a High Source.—Sir Culling Eardley, in a recent speech before the Protestant Alliance in London, addressed the chair, occupied by the Earl of Shaftsbury, and said:—

"My Lord, you had an interview a few months ago with an individual in high position, with whom a few weeks afterwards I had an opportunity of meeting, one who was formerly the Prime Minister of the present Pope, and who is now residing at Genoa. He told me with his own lips, that the system of the Papacy is so utterly rotten, and so utterly detested by the people, that unless some marvelous change should take place, he is certain that its destiny is sealed."

"The Independent" begins the new year much enlarged and improved. It is now printed on eight pages of six columes each, and is the largest religious newspaper in the world.

A Catholic Journal vs. Education.—The Shepherd of the Valley, a Catholic paper published under the sanction of the Bishop of St. Louis, defines its position and the position of the Catholic priesthood of this country as follows:—

"We are not the friend of popular education as at present understood. The popularity of a humbug shall never, we trust, lead us to support it. We do not believe that the 'masses,' as our modern reformers insultingly call the laboring class, are one whit more happy, more respectable, or better informed, for knowing how to read.

"We think that the masses were never less happy, less respectable, and less respected, than they have been since the Reformation, and particularly within the last fifty or one hundred years—since Lord Brougham caught the mania of teaching them to read, and communicated the disease to a large proportion of the English nation.

"The idea that teaching people to read furnishes them with innocent amusement, is entirely false. It furnishes the majority of those who seek amusement from it with the most dangerous recreation in which they can indulge."

The Crystal Palace.—The Juries of the Crystal Palace Association have at length announced their awards. The whole number of silver medals is 115. Of bronze medals there are 1,186, while 1,210 exhibitors (or articles) receive the more simple distinction of an honorable mention. The greatest number of silver medals falls to the lot of the United States. The next country in rank is France, which has 15; while Great Britain has 9, Germany 5, and Switzerland, Australia and Italy one each. Of the bronze medals, the United States has 505, Great Britain 143, France 153, Germany 106, Prussia 30, Belgium 10, Switzerland 29, Holland 12, Austria 18, Italy and Sardinia 44, British Possessions 26, &c.

New Route to the West.—On the 17th inst., the completion of the railroad running across Canada West, from the Suspension Bridge at Niagara Falls to Detroit, was celebrated at the latter city; and but a few days before, the opening of the branch railroad intersecting the main line at Brantford and connecting it with Buffalo, was the occasion of similar festivities. The course of travel henceforth, from Detroit to the seaboard, will be over the Canada Road, across the Suspension Bridge, and the Niagara branch of the Central Railroad to Rochester, and thence to the Eastern cities; and the stream of emigration will pursue the same route in the opposite direction.

The Christian Review for January has a searching examination of Dr. Beecher's new book, "The Conflict of Ages," and an appreciative notice of Dr. Wayland's "Memoir of Judson." Among its literary articles are a critique of De Quincey, a summary of Sir William Hamilton's philosophical theories with an estimate of their value, and an account of Layard's new discoveries at Ninevah and Babylon. An article on the principles and progress of the American Baptists, contains a good deal of interesting information in regard to the growth of that denomination in this country, which has increased within the last sixty years in a ratio far exceeding that of the national census within the same period. "The writer claims for the Baptists a uniform adherence to the principle of entire freedom of conscience to every human being, and it must be admitted makes out a strong case in support of his position. He also makes some striking statements in regard to the prevalence in the community of the distinctive ideas of the Baptists. Infant Baptism, he asserts, has lost its efficacy as a means of membership in the pedobaptist churches, and is silently losing ground among them. Baptist Churches are receiving large accessions from Pedobaptist churches, and the number of ministers who have adopted Baptist principles for a few years past has exceeded one a week."

Harper's Magazine for January was issued about the middle of the month—its appearance having been delayed in consequence of the fire. The introductory article of the number, entitled "A Word of Apology," sets forth a number of interesting facts in regard to the history of Harper & Brothers' Establishment, which, it is stated, was the largest of the kind in the world—that of Brockhaus, in Leipsic, ranking next. Since its foundation in 1817, it has issued over 1,500 separate works, in editions varying from 500 to 50,000 copies each.

Homiletics; or, the Theory of Preaching. By A. Vinet, D.D. Translated and edited by Thomas H. Skinner, D.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology, in the Union Theological Seminary of New York. New York: Ivison & Phinney, 178 Fulton-st.

The design of this work is sufficiently indicated by its title; while the fact that it has become a text-book in some of the first Theological Seminaries of this country, is pretty good proof of the author's success in carrying out the design. For public speakers, and all who would excel in an argumentative and oratorical way, it is an invaluable directory. There is scarcely a question pertaining to the philosophy of rhetoric, to the laws of language and reasoning, or to the mode of influencing the mind by discourse, which is not here treated, and so treated as to show that the writer is master of his subject.

General Intelligence.

SECOND-DAY, JAN 16.

In the SENATE, Mr. Pearce offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to report measures expressive of the estimation entertained for the gallantry of the Captains of the ships Antarctic of New York, Three Bells of Glasgow, and bark Kilby of Boston, in rescuing the officers, crew and passengers of the wrecked steamship San Francisco, which, after some debate, was adopted. Mr. Dixon gave notice of an amendment to the Nebraska bill, by repealing that part of the act admitting Missouri which prohibits slavery north of 36° 30.' Mr. Gwin, from the Naval Committee, reported back from the House a joint resolution approving of the conduct of Capt. Ingraham, and asked its passage. Mr. Clayton resumed his speech on Central American affairs in reply to Mr. Cass.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Bissell introduced a bill for the relief of the United States troops who suffered by the wreck of the steamship San Francisco; also, instructing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations to enable the President to make suitable acknowledgments to the Captains of foreign vessels who may risk their ships and lives in rescuing American citizens in marine disasters. Mr. McDougall introduced a bill providing for increased mail facilities between New York, San Francisco and Oregon; also a bill authorizing the construction of a telegraph line and railroad from the Valley of the Mississippi to the Bay of San Francisco. Mr. Walker offered a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House whether the Assay Office in New York, now in the course of construction, is of sufficient capacity for the coinage of gold and silver. Many other resolutions were offered during the day, and bills appropriating lands for railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Gerritt Smith offered a resolution, that all the members of the human family, notwithstanding all contrary enactments, have at all times, and under all circumstances, a right to the soil, as much as to light and air, and that the duty of the Civil Government is only to regulate the occupation of the public lands, and this on the principle that the great right of the soil is as equal, inherent and sacred, as life itself.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 17.

In the SENATE, several private bills were taken up, and passed. Mr. Sumner presented a petition from New York against paying for the Amistad slaves; also, a petition from New York, praying Congress to separate the Government from all connection with Slavery; he also laid on the table, to be printed, an amendment to the Nebraska bill. Mr. Hamlin, from the Select Committee on French Spoliation Claims, reported a bill appropriating $5,000,000 to pay them. After a short Executive Session, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the reading of the journal, the Senate's resolution for a Joint Committee to make some suitable acknowledgment to Captains Creighton, Stouffer and Law, for their gallant conduct in rescuing the passengers of the steamship San Francisco, was concurred in. The Committee on the Judiciary made a report on the resolution offered by Mr. Ewing, proposing an amendment to the Constitution as to the mode of electing President and Vice-President of the United States. The amendment proposes to abolish the intervention of Electors, and destroys the general ticket system, by dividing the States into the same number of districts as each State has Senators and Representatives. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency bill.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 18.

In the SENATE, various petitions were presented, and several private bills taken up and passed. Mr. Fish presented petitions from New York in favor of a line of steamers between Brooklyn and Germany. Mr. Cooper, of Pa., urged the passage of a bill granting lands to the Sunbury and Erie Railroad. A bill to reimburse the Common Council of New York certain expenditures for the First Regiment of New York Volunteers was passed.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after disposing of the usual opening business, the resolutions providing for the appointment of a Committee of Nine to join such Committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to inquire into the propriety of changing the mode of electing the President and Vice-President, were adopted. The Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill, which was adopted, providing for the payment of a sum equal in amount to pay and allowances for four months to each of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians or privates who are sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco. The bill making appropriations for the support of the West Point Military Academy was taken up and passed. Pending the question of its passage, Gerrit Smith addressed the House in opposition to war and the maintenance of institutions calculated to encourage the war spirit. He was opposed to making military and naval preparations for war, because such preparations were provocative of war. Instead of instructing and arming the nation in the science and with the implements of blood-shedding, he would invest them with a moral, Christian and intellectual armor, which would promote peace on earth and good will among the nations thereof. Not that he was opposed to military and naval schools—he would appropriate four times the annual amount for their support, and would have four times the number of scholarships that are now provided for—but instead of mainly teaching the science and art of killing, he would instruct, wholly, in the art and science of preserving and saving the bodies and souls of men. He was in favor of an army—not an aggregation of immoral, dissolute, brute force—but an army of moral, Christianized, educated men, who would prevent rather than promote war; and in case of war, one of the latter would be worth fifty of the former.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 19.

In the SENATE, Mr. Brodhead presented petitions from Philadelphia against the establishment of a Mint in New York. Mr. Gwin introduced a resolution inquiring of the Navy Department what force we have now on the Pacific coast, and whether it could be made efficient to prevent fillibustering expeditions from leaving California and attacking the possessions of Mexico, upon which a warm debate sprung up, in which Senators Pettit, Brodhead, Mason and several other Senators, participated. At the conclusion of the debate, a short executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned over until Second-day.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Committee on Military Affairs was instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a road from Great Salt Lake City to the boundary of California. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on resolutions proposing to refer the various branches of the President's Message to appropriate Committees. Mr. Keitt of South Carolina, having the floor, proceeded to address the House on the loyalty of South Carolina to the Union. Mr. Hughes of New York, followed on the subject of New York politics.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 20.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the disposal of the usual routine of business, the House went into Committee of the Whole, and Mr. Cutting having the floor, replied to the speech made by Mr. Hughes yesterday, in relation to the Democracy of New York. General Walbridge also addressed the House.

European News.

One week later news from Europe was received in New York on Second-day last, by telegraph from Halifax.

The intelligence from Constantinople and St. Petersburg continues to be as contradictory as ever, but the latest rumors are of a character to leave in the estimation of the public scarcely any hope that the Czar will accept the last proposition of the Western powers, and this view of the matter is almost universally entertained at Constantinople.

As a natural consequence of the greatly increased probabilities of a general European war, the English stock and Breadstuff markets have been greatly excited. The Breadstuff markets throughout Great Britain had been more excited than at any previous time since the famine in Ireland, and prices had largely advanced.

Great Britain, France and Belgium had been visited with the heaviest snow storm experienced for many years past, and apprehensions were entertained of destructive floods from the melting snow and rain.

A NOBLE DEED NOBLY REWARDED.—Admiration is everywhere expressed of the conduct of the captains and officers of the Three Bells, the Kilby, and the Antarctic, the vessels which took off the passengers and crew of the steamer San Francisco. Subscriptions have been taken in several cities, to present them suitable testimonials. In New York, nearly $20,000 was raised in a few days, from which it is determined to present to the Captains each $2,500, a gold medal, and silver pitcher or tea service, at their option. To the mates, $250 and a gold medal each. To the second mates, $200 each and a gold medal. To the petty officers, $100 each and a gold medal. To the seamen, $50 each and a silver medal. To the captain of the Lucy Thompson, a service of plate, to cost $1,000, and a gold medal. To the mate of the Lucy Thompson, $250 and a gold medal. To the other officers of the Lucy Thompson, a gold medal each, and half the amount in money awarded to the officers of like grade, of the first named three ships. To the seamen of the Lucy Thompson, each $25 and a silver medal. A service of plate valued at $1,000 and a gold medal to Lieut. Murray, of the Navy. A service of plate valued at $1,000 and a gold medal to Captain Watkins. To Mr. Marshall, Chief Engineer of the San Francisco, $500 and a gold medal. To the first mate of the San Francisco, $250 and a gold medal. To the second mate of the San Francisco, $200 and a gold medal.

TREATY WITH MEXICO.—A new treaty with Mexico is said to have been negotiated by Gen. Gadsden, of which one of the daily papers gives the following account:—

"It gives us a narrow strip of territory across the north end of Mexico—hardly twenty miles wide at this end, but widening after passing out of the valley of the Rio Grande, where there is some good land that Santa Anna decided to keep. In all, we acquire a strip averaging some sixty miles in width, and running across to the Gulf of California, for which and the extinction of the claims of Mexico under the stipulation of the last Treaty, which obligates us to pay for all the damage which Mexicans may suffer at the hands of the amiable savages we bought of her by that Treaty, we are to pay Twenty Millions! That is to say: By one Treaty we bought the Camanches and their cut-throat neighbors, and agreed to pay for what damage they might do thereafter; by the other, we pay Five Millions for the damage they have already done, and Fifteen Millions more for a strip of territory over which to make a railroad (if we please) whereby it is somehow calculated that they are to be deterred from plundering Mexicans hereafter."

THE POULTRY SHOW.—The National Poultry Show in New York is to open on the 13th of February, in Barnum's Museum. The charges for admission are to be the same as to the Museum on ordinary occasions. Exhibitors will be admitted free. A list of premiums amounting to $500 has been adopted, and it is agreed that exhibitors shall be at no expense whatever for care and keeping of the fowls while in the City. Most of the railroads have agreed to transport the poultry for the show free of charge. The highest premium is $50 for the best and largest variety of pure bred fowls. The second premium is $25. Others of $20, $15, $10, $8, $5, &c., &c., for all the varieties known.

Another destructive fire occurred in New York on the 18th inst., burning down the long building in the Park, known as the New City Hall, and occupied by the U. S. Courts, Supreme Court, Commissioners of Emigration, City Inspector, Coroners, Tax Commissioners, Law Library, and other public offices. The building, was one of little value, and except some important records, no extensive loss was sustained.

There is a painful rumor in the marine dispatches from Halifax, of the loss of the brig Mary Jane, from Dublin for New York, with one hundred and fifty passengers, of whom only six escaped with life.

Mr. Alexander de Bodisco, who for the past fifteen years or thereabouts, has filled the post of Russian Envoy at Washington, is lying at the point of death.

SUMMARY.

Within the last five days (says the Voice of the Fugitive, C. W.,) several interesting little companies of fugitives have landed at this depot on the invisible train of cars. Among them we have a man and his wife from New Orleans, several from Missouri, some from Kentucky and Virginia, and three from South Carolina. In addition to the above, we have reports from the Amherstburg depot, where a still larger lot of this description of freight has been received during the past week, and the cry is "still they come." Self emancipation is now the order of the day among the hereditary bondmen of the United States. Since, the above was written, we have had nine more arrivals in Windsor from different States.

A correspondent writes to the N. Y. Tribune, from a village in Indiana, that in said village lives a mother who had a husband whose name she does not bear, who has two daughters, each of them divorced wives, one of whom obtained her bill while her husband lay on his death-bed; while in the same village resides a man who has two wives living (one of them divorced,) and these wives are mother and daughter! Some of the Western States are notorious for the facility and liberality with which they grant Divorces; wherefrom a harvest of lewd Marriages, Licentiousness and Immorality may be expected to result in due season.

A dispatch dated Mount Vernon, Ohio, Jan. 21, 1854 says: Yesterday afternoon this section of the country was visited by the heaviest storm of wind, rain, thunder and lightning, that we have experienced since 1828. A perfect tornado was experienced some six miles south of this. The town of Brandon was almost entirely destroyed, scarcely a house being left to mark the site of the place. Dr. Wheaton was seriously if not fatally injured, and a Mrs. Smith was also badly hurt. The tornado was about half a mile wide, tearing up every thing in its track.

Our readers will recollect the particulars of a horrible case in South Carolina, in which two white men, named Thomas Mottey and William Blackledge, hunted down a runaway slave with blood-hounds, and then put him to death by the most prolonged and cruel tortures. These fiends were brought before the Court of Appeals at Charleston recently, and after the motion for new trials had been dismissed, were sentenced to be hung on the 3d day of March next.

Mr. Ira B. Cary, the eldest partner in the firm of Dows & Cary, died on Saturday morning, Jan. 14, at his residence in Whitestown, Oneida County, at the age of 58. He had been in the produce commission business in this city for nearly thirty years, first with an elder brother of his present partner, and leaves a fortune, estimated at from three to five hundred thousand dollars. Mr. C. was a self-made man. In his youth he was a boatman on the canal, and subsequently a school teacher. He had always a strong love for rural life, and this he gratified by making one of the finest farms in the State.

A resolution was offered in the New York Senate on Saturday, Jan. 14th, directing the New York and Harlem Railroad Company and the Hudson River Railroad Company to report forthwith to the Senate whether any agreement has been made or entered into between said companies for maintaining a certain rate of fare between Albany and New York, and if so, what are the terms of said agreement; also, whether there is any agreement or understanding as to charges upon freight carried over the said roads; and if so, the terms of such agreement.

The Marysville (Ky.) Eagle says that Nicholas Arthur, of that city, hit upon a novel plan for making a "nimble sixpence" the other day. Just above the railroad culvert he built a temporary dam and set a trap for catching fish. Passing it the next day, he observed considerable oily substance, or grease, adhering to the dam. He cleared it off and took the scum from the water, realizing some $50 for his first day's labor, and $10 per day for several days since. The grease was washed down from a large pork slaughtering-house.

Three of the crew of the clipper ship Tam O'Shanter, from Calcutta for Boston, arrived at Charleston, Jan. 15, and report that the ship was abandoned on the 28th ult., at which time she had fifteen feet of water in her hold. Thirteen of her crew were rescued by the ship Wellfleet, from Boston bound to New Orleans, and Capt. Soulé, and Messrs. Lea and Roland, passengers, were rescued by the schooner Fides, from a northern port, bound to the West Indies.

Abraham Teshune died at Harlington, Somerset County, N. J., on the 12th inst., at the age of 94. He was born at Cross Roads, Middlesex County; removed to Peekskill at 16 years of age, joined the army while young, was engaged in building old Fort Putnam, fought at White Plains, and afterward returned to New Jersey, where he again joined the army, and was engaged in the battle of Springfield and other contests.

The gross receipts of the Milwaukie and Mississippi Railroad for 1853 (on 70 running miles) are thus stated:—From Passengers, $78,635 39; from Freight, $142,820 29. Total, $221,455 63. Expenses of operating road, repairs to track, cars and engines, salaries, &c, $87,115 43. Net Receipts, $134,340 14. Interest $58,200.

The Etna Insurance Co., of Utica, N. Y., has suspended payment for the present in consequence of heavy losses. The Company hopes to pay, eventually, all its liabilities. A new Company will be organized with the same officers, with a cash capital of one hundred thousand dollars.

The Amendment to the New York State Constitution, authorizing the speedy completion of the unfinished Canals, has been perfected, so far as the Legislature can do it, and now only requires the People's Ratification; for which purpose a Special Election will be held throughout the State on the third Wednesday (15th) of next month.

Collections have been made in New York to the amount of ten or twelve thousand dollars for the purpose of a testimonial to the officers of the ships which took off the passengers of the steamer San Francisco. Other cities are doing similar things.

It is estimated that some twenty odd papers in Indiana have openly avowed themselves in favor of a prohibitory liquor law, and only three have declared themselves opposed to it.

The number of deaf mutes in the Pennsylvania Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, at the present time, is 139—73 boys and 66 girls. 98 of these are supported by the State of Pennsylvania, 12 by Maryland, 8 by New Jersey, 4 by Delaware, and 17 by the Institution or by friends. During the year 1853, 13 girls and 13 boys were admitted, and 30 of the inmates were dismissed, viz. 18 boys and 12 girls. Of the 26 admitted in 1853, 12 were born deaf; 11 of the 26 are from Pennsylvania. Of the 98 from Pennsylvania, 22 are from Philadelphia.

Mr. McMullen, Member of Congress from Virginia, has been arrested and bound over to keep the peace on the chrage of assaulting the barkeeper of Brown's Hotel at Washington. This is the man, if we mistake not, who was found guilty, by a Philadelphia court, of a gross and unprovoked assault upon Mr. R. M. Titsworth, of Plainfield, N. J., while on board the steamboat below Trenton.

The Banner of the Times says that C. H. Ellis, the proprietor of the DeRuyter and New Berlin line of mail stages, has been arrested by the U. S. Marshal for mail robbery, and is bound over for trial in the sum of $800. He is charged with having taken from a letter directed to a Mr. Perry of Columbus, a draft on Hamilton Bank in favor of said Perry, forging his name upon the back, sending it to the Bank and receiving the money.

Private letters from the Ionian Islands say that Zante and Cephalonia are in a most deplorable condition. The failure of the currant crop for two successive years has cut off the only supply from which the inhabitants of those two islands, in particular, derive their main support. The land-owner and the laborer are both suffering under such a calamity; but it is in the latter that want with its attendant horrors weighs heavily, and is crushing them to death.

The Salem Register gives an account of a sad mortality in Wantage, near that place. A Mr. Solomon Marshall, aged 48 years, his daughter, aged 21, and two sons aged 16 and 19 respectively, had all died of typhoid fever within a week; and his wife and third son were lying at the point of death. The first of the disease in the family, that of a boy of 12, did not prove fatal. There are also four younger children who have escaped the malady.

The population of Toledo, Ohio, Jan. 1, 1853, was 8,497, being a gain of 3,085 over the previous year. The Blade states that the census shows a growth during the past year of between 32 and 33 per cent. It shows a gain since June 1, 1850, of about 120 per cent., equal to a duplication of the population every two years and six months. This growth is more rapid than that of any of the other Lake towns.

A dispatch dated Plainfield, N. J., Tuesday, Jan. 17, 1854, says: "A passenger by the eastern down train, named Joshua Sanders, fell from the cars as they were passing this place, at noon, yesterday, and a wheel passed over his right arm, crushing it in an awful manner, and inflicting a terrible gash on his right cheek. He was on his way with his family to Berkshire Co., Massachusetts." He has since died.

Mr. J. L. Bryan, of Moore County, sold at public auction, on the 20th ult., a pack of ten hounds, trained for hunting runaways, for the sum of $1,540. The highest price paid for any one dog was $301, lowest price $75; average for the ten $154. The terms of sale were 6 months credit, with approved security and interest from date.

The Rev. Charles Pitman, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died at Trenton, N. J., on Saturday morning, Jan 14. Dr. P. held for a long time the office of Missionary Secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Church. For some years he has been incapacitated for duty by a softening of the brain.

It is stated that the cause of the failure of the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank of Oswego was the refusal of the Bank Department to issue new notes in exchange for mutilated notes. After the bank had accumulated about $20,000 of these notes, which were too ragged for circulation, it was obliged to suspend.

Accounts from Prince Edward's Island report that the gale of the 23d December was most destructive there, blowing down houses and barns, uprooting trees, and killing a large number of cattle. St. Paul's Church, at Charlottetown, was unroofed and badly damaged.

A gentleman of Alton, Illinois, has invented a pocket pistol, which, it is said, will prime itself and fire thirty-six times in succession. It is only six inches in length, though it will throw a ball with sufficient force to perforate an inch plank at the distance of a hundred feet.

Samuel Brittain, a Scotch spinner, employed by T. R. Wells & Co., Temperance Valley, R. I., was found dead, on the morning of the 7th inst., in the woods about half a mile from Potter's Hill. Two bottles were found in his pockets, one of which was full of gin, and the other had been emptied of the vile stuff.

The railroad troubles at Erie, Pa., continue, greatly impeding the progress of travelers, and entirely stopping the transportation of heavy freight, live stock, &c. In a letter from Mr. Brown, dated at Erie, Jan. 18th, he says: "The women are valiant here. They turned out in troops yesterday, and tore down another railroad bridge!"

Geo. Peabody Esq., of London, has recently made another donation to his native town of Danvers of $200 a year, during his life, for distribution in annual prize of merit among the pupils of the Peabody and Holton high-schools of that town.

MARRIED,

In Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., Jan. 1st, by Eld. L. M. Cottrell, Mr. FRANCIS M. BABCOCK, of Persia, to Miss VILDA BABCOCK, of Northeast, Erie Co., Pa.

On Sunday morning, Dec. 18th, by the Rev. Wm. Gilliam, Mr. JOHN H. EMERSON to Miss CATHERINE BURT, daughter of James Burt, Esq.

DIED,

In Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., Jan. 8th, 1854, of inflammatory rheumatism, DANIEL RANDALL, in the 22d year of his age. The deceased had not made a profession of religion previous to his sickness. But to the great joy of his friends he obtained a hope in the pardoning mercy of God. For three weeks his disease rendered it almost impossible for him to converse. This he bore, as he did his extreme suffering, with Christian fortitude. Death was deprived of its sting, and a holy calm rested upon his countenance as his spirit took its flight to the unseen world. L. M. C.

Business Notice.—The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society has been in operation nearly five years—long enough, certainly, to carry on the publishing business without a thorough settlement of accounts. Such a settlement we intend to have before the close of the present volume of the Sabbath Recorder. An Agent has been engaged for the purpose, who will enter upon his work about the first of February. Those indebted to the establishment need be in no doubt as to the amount of their indebtedness, inasmuch as bills have been sent them each year. What we wish now to say to them is, that in all cases where the amount of those bills is forwarded to us immediately, by mail direct, or through our local agents, the accounts will be squared on our books. In all cases where payment is delayed until the Agent calls, fifty cents per year will be added, according to our published terms. Promptness will save the trouble and expense of a call from the agent.

The Reproof.

Whisper it softly,
When nobody's near,
Let not those accents
Fall harsh on her ear,
She is a blossom,
Too tender and frail
For the keen blast—
The pitiless gale.

Whisper it gently,
'Twill cost thee no pain;
Gentle words rarely
Are spoken in vain;
Threats and reproaches
The stubborn may move—
Noble the conquest
Aided by love.

Whisper it kindly,
'Twill pay thee to know,
Penitent tear-drops
Down her cheeks flow.
Has she from virtue
Wandered astray?
Guide her feet gently,
Rough is the way.

She has no parent,
None of her kin;
Lead her from error,
Keep her from sin.
Does she lean on thee?
Cherish the trust;—
God to the merciful
Ever is just. [Home Gazette.

The Atmospheric Telegraph.

Mr. Richardson, the Inventor of the Atmospheric Telegraph, has placed a working model of his invention in one of the rooms adjoining the Senate Chamber at Washington. It is thus described by the Washington correspondent of the New York Times:—

"The model consists first of a metal pipe or tube, with a bore one inch in diameter, so arranged that it may be opened or closed at different points for the admission or the exhaustion of the atmosphere at will. A plunger or plug is made of the same diameter as the bore, designed to run easily within the tube, and yet so arranged as to prevent the passage of the air between its side and the inner surface of the tube. Back of this plunger or sliding plug, a miniature mail-bag, big enough to carry a President's Message or two, is fastened. The mail-bag, by the way, is a trifle less in diameter than the plunger. A little exhausting pump is connected with the telegraph tube by a smaller tube, through which the atmosphere is to be withdrawn.

"When the plunger with its attached load is all ready for its journey, the telegraph tube is closed and rendered nearly air-tight in that part of it which is between the plunger and the point to which it is designed to be propelled. The air in front of the plunger is then withdrawn by the action of the exhaust pump, and a vacuum is created, into which the plunger and its load rushes, impelled by the pressure of the atmosphere in that part of the pipe which is back of the loaded plunger. For stopping at way stations, valves are inserted at the points where the stopping is desired, and the operation of exhausting the atmosphere and impelling the load is repeated from point to point, in the manner already described.

"It will be seen that the capacity of this telegraph for speed is limited only by the capacity of machinery to exhaust the atmosphere. But this work of exhausting may be all completed while the load is being made up. To accomplish this, a valve is placed in front of the plunger, which cuts off all connection, of course, between the plunger and the vacuum through which it is to be propelled. This done, while the load is being prepared, the pumps may exhaust the tube, and then upon closing the tube over the plunger and load by means of an air-tight cap, and raising the valve between the plunger and the vacuum which has already been created, it will be seen that the whole load will fly to its destination with a motion as rapid as that of the atmosphere itself.

"The inventor is entirely confident that a telegraph upon this principle may be constructed at a cost of $2000 per mile, of quite sufficient capacity to transport the heaviest mails and express freight at a rate of speed equalled by nothing else save the lightning itself."

Strawberries.

The N. Y. Tribune of Jan. 18th, says:—We have several specimens of this fruit lying upon our desk as we write, which were plucked from vines grown in the open air and fruit ripened without the aid of a hot house. The plants from which we plucked these berries were grown upon the plantation of George A. Peabody, about five miles from Columbus, Ga., and sent to this City in a basket some weeks ago, where they have been blooming and ripening fruit ever since. Mr. Peabody has five or six acres covered with strawberry plants—plants, not vines, for they have no runner—from which he gathers fruit and sends to market regularly every day for an average period of six months in the year; making them, by his peculiar mode of cultivation, produce abundantly through the long hot summers, and sparsely through three or four other months.

The variety cultivated is the Hovey seeding, impregnated with the early scarlet, and so changed in their character that they manifest no more disposition to throw out runners than the wild vines of the old pastures in their uncultivated state. Mr. Peabody endeavors to conform his cultivation as closely to nature as possible. He sets the plants in rows two feet apart, with a row of impregnators every sixth row, and in the fall spreads a slight coat of woods mold, and covers the ground completely with leaves, but never afterward digs up the surface or applies any other manure. Grass and weeds are cut up with a hoe, and runners which only occasionally appear are cut away, unless the old plant is failing, and then that is cut up and a new one started.

Every day during summer the vines are copiously watered by the assistance of a garden engine. This is the principal cause of success; of continued production and reproduction of fruit through a long season.

We have seen upon these beds a growth of fruit ten times greater by weight or measure than all the vines and leaves producing it, and at the same time, upon the same soil, only a few rods off, a growth of vines which would have afforded a good swath to the mower, upon which there was not a single berry. This bed was highly manured, and bore vines. The other bed was highly watered, and bore fruit.

Dr. Hull, of Newburgh, has mulched his beds with spent tan bark, instead of leaves, and found it eminently beneficial, increasing the productiveness, richness of flavor, and length of time of bearing. The question which naturally suggests itself to the minds of all is this:

Can we lengthen the bearing season of the strawberry plant in this climate by pursuing the same course which has proved so wonderfully successful with Mr. Peabody?

New Brick Machine.

Among the many astonishing evidences of the power of machinery, and the perfection to which it has attained, none (says the Baltimore American) seem more worthy of examination and commendable notice than the steam brick works of Mr. Francis H. Smith. The proprietor has in constant operation one of his first class machines, for which a gold medal was awarded him by the Maryland Institute. Since that time, however, he has introduced such improvements as, in the opinion of scientific men, warrant the merit of a new invention. The modus operandi, nevertheless, is quite simple. The clay is wheeled along on a plank scaffolding to the pulverizer at the top of the machine, which converts it into dust immediately, and incorporates it with the water thrown thereupon. In this state it is thrown into the machine, which revolves steadily, pressing the clay down into sets of molds, five in each frame, which move on a railway beneath. The molds are then transferred to a light barrow, moved to the yard, and discharged in the usual way. The clay is worked much stiffer than it can be done by hand, and gives a solidity to the brick and correctness of form rarely equaled. We timed the operation by a watch, and found it producing thirty bricks per minute—the average speed, however, is twenty-five per minute. It will easily produce 15,000 per day. We next saw in operation, a similar machine, worked by a horse, with the same result—the bricks being equal in every respect, and fifteen made per minute. Machinery has hitherto been directed to work either the dry clay or soft mud. The present invention is intended for a medium between these extremes, and to mold the bricks from clay tempered to a consistence fit for the potter's wheel, or suitable for front brick, and, consequently, in quality, they must nearly resemble the latch brick. The work is performed by ordinary laborers, chiefly boys. The extreme difficulty of applying machinery to the rapid performance of such peculiar work, the simplicity of construction, thus greatly lessening the liability of accident, and the moderate cost, have resulted from the invention. Besides, there is no time for trifling among the operators. Each person must be promptly at his post, and is obliged to move briskly at his work, for the machine will not allow laziness nor indulgence—it waits for no one.

Damp Stables.

When I first came to the farm which I now hold by purchase, I found the stables built under large trees and near a spring of water, with a northern aspect. My horses were soon in poor condition, with long and rough coats, and almost always lax in their bowels, nor could I get them up by extra food or lighter work; but my cows suffered the most, for they were always sick. Their milk fell off and their butter was poor, and of a bad color and taste, and four of them slipped their calves before their time. When the spring came they left their winter quarters in a worse state then I had ever seen them, and two of them died from scours on going to pasture. On inquiry, I found that the tenant who had left had always been what the neighbors termed unfortunate in his horses and cattle, and from that cause, more than any other, he had not been able to make both ends meet. The truth flashed upon me in an instant, and in a very little longer time than it has taken me to tell my story, I had commenced pulling down the stable, the unhealthiness of which had been, I was convinced, the cause of all evil and all the loss; and it was no more than two days before there was not left one stone upon another of the whole fabric. I now set to work and erected another on higher ground, removed from water, and clear from the shade of trees, with a south-east aspect, and dry capacious yard; and from that day I have had neither sickness nor sorrow in my out door house-hold. My horses live on less food, are always sleek and in good condition, and my cows are a credit to their keep. Our butter brings two cents a pound more in the market, and for the last year our sales are more than double from the same number of cows and the same pasturage, and no more premature calves. Instead of watering my cattle as heretofore, at the spring under the trees—the water cold, with a deadly taste and bad color—I sunk a well and put in a pump; and at a long trough in the yard for the summer, and another under shelter for the winter, my cattle slake their thirst without setting up their coats, as they used to do after drinking at the hole under the trees. Even when the weather was warm, they were accustomed to shake all over as if they were in a fit of ague after drinking their fill of this water; and to this, with the bad aspect of the stables, I attribute all the sickness and misery which I have experienced among my cattle and horses. [Bost. Cultivator.

Irish Uncertainty.

I have often heard it remarked and complained of by travelers and strangers, that they never could get a true answer from any Irish peasant as to distances, when on a journey. For many years I myself thought it very unaccountable. If you meet a peasant on your journey, and ask him how far, for instance to Ballinrobe, he will probably say it is 'three short miles.' You travel on, and are imformed by the next peasant you meet, that 'it is five long miles.' On you go, and the next will tell 'your honor' it is 'four miles, or about the same." The fourth will swear if your honor stops at three miles, you'll never get there!' But on pointing to a town just before you, and inquiring what place that is, he replies—'O! plaze your honor, that's Ballinrobe, sure enough!' 'Why, you said it was more than three miles off!' 'O! yes, to be sure and sartin, that's from my cabin, plaze your honor. We're no scholars in this country. Arrah! how can we tell any distance, plaze your honor, but from our own little cabins? Nobody but the schoolmaster knows that, plaze your honor.' Thus is the mystery unravelled. When you ask any peasant the distance of the place you require, he never computes it from where you then are, but from his own cabin; so that, if you asked twenty, in all probability you would have as many different answers, and not one of them correct. But it is to be observed, that frequently you can get no reply at all unless you understand Irish.

Cold as a Styptic.

The following statement, by The Rochester Union, is medically suggestive, as well as thrilling:—

We gave an account last week of a singular shooting accident, which took place at the mouth of the river. The escape of the injured man was even more remarkable than was at first supposed. The contents of his gun were accidentally discharged through his hand and neck, just as he was in the act of stepping from his skiff to the pier. He fell powerless into the boat, and was far more liable to have fallen into the water. The boat was not made fast, and slowly drifted into the lake. It is anything but desirable for a man in the full possession of all his faculties, to be adrift in a skiff, on a cold winter's day, on Lake Ontario, and still less so to one who had received two severe gun-shot wounds. However, he survived and came out safe. He must have remained in the boat some five or six hours, and would certainly have perished by cold had he not been discovered about the time he was. The cold tended, however, to staunch the flowing of the blood from his wounds. The skiff drifted down the lake more than four miles, and was seen by some men from the Sand-bar. They at first supposed it to be a log, but as it came nearer they discovered that it was a boat, and resolved to secure it. They went to it in another boat, and found the man lying insensible in his blood on the boat's bottom. Fortunately, Dr. Butler, of Irondequoit, happened to be near the Bar, and promptly came to the aid of the suffering man. His wounds were dressed, and he is rapidly recovering.

A Leaf of Memory Lost.

An old man's memory is a queer place. Indeed, it resembles an old-fashioned garret, full of relics and souvenirs of the past; the rubbish of to-day, but riches of yesterday.

In conversation, yesterday, with an old man, who has passed a long and useful life, and with whom now it is Indian Summer, we were impressed with a remark he incidentally made. He had seen the opening of near seventy springs; at first, the winters came and went; but by and by, unmelted snow-flakes lingered in his hair, and he saw them drifting over the graves of one after another, whose feet, with his, had brushed the morning dews together. At last, they whitened over his old wife's last resting-place—over her who knew him when the shadows fell to the westward and "the day was before" them both—who never thought him old, though all the world pronounced him so. Everybody said when she died, "It is a terrible blow to the old man," and a few did all they could to make him forget; but there was no need of that, "for," said he, "they did'nt seem to know where the blow fell, they so deplored—they did'nt think how much I missed somebody to help me remember!"

Those few words, indeed, contain a world of meaning. He did miss the other leaf from memory's tablet. Two pairs of eyes had but one rainbow; but one pair beheld it now. Two hearts had lived over again the past; but one remembered it—and imperfectly now. Who would have life's little thread extended, 'till he too, should be compelled to take up the words and say, "I miss somebody to help me remember?"

Sweeney.

A correspondent of the Dollar Newspaper gives some imformation in regard to the cause, cure, &c., of the lameness in horses called sweeney, as follows:—

As to the cause, I am not prepared to say, further than I believe it is generally caused by a bruise, sprain or hurt of some description. But I can vouch for the efficacy of the following preparation, it having been long used in our neighborhood with unfailing success:

Take four eggs, one-third of a pound of butter, fresh from the churn, three-fourths of a gill of oil of stone, and an equal quantity of oil of spike. In making the salve, break the eggs into a bowl or earthern vessel, containing nearly a quart, then with a chip of pine wood stir the eggs well in the bowl, melt the butter in a pan, without letting it get hot, and add it to the eggs, stirring the mixture thoroughly. Lastly, add the other ingredients, and, after stirring the whole once more together it will be ready for use. A heated iron should be held near the diseased part whenever the salve is applied.

The Way they Make Hot-Beds in Germany.

Take white cotton cloth of a close texture, stretch and nail it on frames of any size you wish take two ounces of lime-water, four ounces of linseed oil, one ounce of white of eggs, two ounces of yolk of eggs; mixed the lime and oil with very gentle heat, beat the eggs well separately, and mix them with the former; spread the mixture with a paint-brush over the cotton, allowing each coat to dry before applying another, until they become waterproof. The following are the advantages this shade possesses over a glass one: 1. The cost being hardly one-fourth. 2. Repairs are easily and cheaply made. 3. They are light. They do not require watering; no matter how intense the heat of the sun, the plants are never struck down or burnt, faded or checked in growth—neither do they grow up so long, sick, and weakly as they do under glass, and still there is abundance of light. 4. The heat arising entirely from below, is more equable and temperate, which is a great object. The vapor arising from the manure and earth is condensed by the cool air passing over the surface of the shade, and stands in drops on the inside, and, therefore, the plants do not require as frequent watering. If the frames or stretches are made large, they should be intersected by cross-bars about a foot square, to support the cloth. These articles are just the thing for bringing forward seeds in season for transplanting. [Plough, Loom, & Anv.

An Imperial Bedroom.—The Paris correspondent of the Mirror of Fashion gives the following account of the bedroom of the Empress Eugenie, at the Tuileries, having seen it previous to her majesty's recent return from Fontainbleau:—

"The upholsters have furnished it with a magnificent sky-blue silk tenture along the walls, which is fixed by gold frames, in the style of Louis XV. The arm-chairs, chairs, sofas, and lounges are of the same style and like silk. As for the bed, all made with gilt carved wood, it is covered with a couvre pieds of Maline lace, and the curtains, of blue silk and lace, are hung down all around it, in the same manner as the old beds of our grandmothers. The carpet is also of a blue color, and so thick that one would take it for a bear skin. It was made at Anbusson, expressly for the place in which it lays. The ceiling of the room was painted by Mr. Bresson, and it represents a group of geniuses throwing flowers from rich baskets. The painting is so well done that no one could believe that the figures are not alive. In short, this magnificent bedroom is the ne plus ultra of riches and elegance. But what are the dreams under those laces?"

Transitoryness of Life.—George D. Prentice, editor of the Louisville Journal, thus closes a touching tribute to the memory of his late partner, Mr. Thomas H. Shreve, assistant editor of the Journal:—

"We, the surviving editor of the Journal, feel that the prime of life is scarcely yet gone, yet, as we look back upon our long career in this city, we seem to behold, near and far, only the graves of the prized and the lost. All the numerous journeymen and apprentices that were in our employ when we first commenced publishing our paper are dead, our first partner, our second partner, and our third partner are dead, our first assistant and our last assistant are also dead. When these memories come over us, we feel like one alone at midnight, in the midst of a church-yard, with the winds sighing mournfully around him through the broken tombs, and the voices of the ghosts of departed joys sounding dolefully in his ears. Our prayer to God is that such memories may have a chastening and purifying and elevating influence upon us, and fit us to discharge, better than we have ever yet done, our duties to earth and to heaven."

A Robbed Man Seeking Protection from the Robbers!!—The robbery in Madison, Ct., on the 4th inst., was a very strange affair to happen in that peaceable, moral town. Two young men entered the house of Mr. Goff, (who is an infirm, aged man, and he and his wife were all that were in the house,) about 12 o'clock at night, with pistol and dirk, and demanded his money. The old man fled for his life up stairs. The wife cried murder; one of the men knocked her down, and several of her fingers were cut in the affray. The robbers broke open a trunk and took from it $800—one half in gold, the other in bank notes. As soon as the robbers left the house, the old man and wife went about half a mile to stop for the rest of the night, (as they were so frightened they dare not stay in their own house,) they met a young man in the street, a relative, and told him they had been robbed, and that Mrs. Goff was badly wounded. The young man invited them to his home, and the three went quietly to bed without giving any alarm! which circumstance caused suspicion to rest upon the young man. He was arrested the day but one after, and before night confessed the abominable crime; told of his associate, and where the money was hidden.

Elevated Railway.—The American Artisan publishes an article, in which it is claimed by the projector that an Elevated Iron Railway could be built to the Pacific cheaper and with more facility than a railroad upon the ground. He proposes to build a double track, resting upon sections of columns, placed about two rods apart. The body of the car hangs below the track, so that there is a space of thirteen or fourteen feet beneath the structure, and it is necessary to ascend but slightly to reach the cars. The "tracks" are attached to trusses stretching from column to column, and are firmly braced. But little or no grading is required, as he uses long columns in passing over valleys and ravines, and climbs hills and mountains by placing a "cogged track" outside and above the ordinary one, adapted to smaller cogged drive wheels. The principal part of the work of building would be centered at iron mines, and it could be built in any latitude, without the snow destroying its utility.

A Wonderful Wood Cut.—The Sandusky Register raps the Plaindealer over the knuckles for attempting to pass off the likeness of Mr. Hobensack on its readers for Omar Pascha, the Turkish generalissimo. The same picture was palmed off not long since as the fac-simile of Napoleon the Little, subsequently as Kossuth, then of the patriot O'Brien, next of Mazzini, afterwards of the Czar of all the Russias. It originally appeared in one of the Eastern neutrals as the picture of a popular love-sick novel writer. It was published in the Plaindealer last spring as the cut of President Pierce, and secured to the editor the Post-Office. It is now paraded as the frontispiece of Omar Pascha. The magic bottle of of McAllister could not produce as many sorts of liquor from one orifice, as the mystic wood cut of the Plaindealer can likenesses.

United States Militia.—The number of militia in the United States, according to a document lately furninhed to Congress, is as follows: Maine, 44,665; New Hampshire, 27,667; Massachusetts, 101,781; Vermont, 23,915; Rhode Island, 13,653; Connecticut, 57,719; New York, 201,452; New Jersey, 39,171; Pennsylvania, 276,070; Delaware, 9,220; Maryland, 46,864; Virginia, 124,002; North Carolina, 79,448; South Carolina, 55,209; Georgia, 57,312; Alabama, 44,331; Louisiana, 43,823; Mississippi, 36,084; Tennessee, 71,252; Kentucky, 88,629; Ohio, 176,455; Indiana, 53,913; Illinois, 83,134; Missouri, 61,000; Arkansas, 17,137; Michigan, 60,017; Florida, 12,122; Texas, 19,776; Wisconsin, 32,203; District of Columbia, 1,248. Total of militia in the United States, 1,959,782, or probably, with full returns from all the States, two millions.

A Large Verdict.—The Milwaukee News, Jan. 7, says the suit of Thomas H. Silkman against Davis & More, for injuries received by plaintiff by the upsetting of the stage coach belonging to the line of stages of which they are part proprietors, was brought to a close in the United States District Court night before last, and the Jury returned a verdict yesterday morning of $6,490. The accident happened at Vernon, Wis., in 1850. The plaintiff fractured the elbow-joint, from which he almost lost the use of his right arm. One point decided by the Court, we understand, was that the fact that the plaintiff had been maltreated by his physician was not to be taken into consideration by the Jury in mitigation of damages, as he must be supposed to have employed the best medical assistance in his power, and the stage company were therefore responsible for all the consequences of the injury. Mr. Silkman is a merchant of New York City.

Another Martyr.—Of Captain Drayton, who has suffered a long imprisonment for assisting in the escape of slaves from the District of Columbia, we find the following mournful notice in the Boston Commonwealth:

This noble man and generous hero left us on Monday, doubtless never to visit us again. His constitution was wholly broken down by his imprisonment, and since his liberation, his little remaining health and strength have been continually wasting. He came on here a few weeks since, hoping to spend some time in Massachusetts, in traveling and selling his narrative, (which has just been published,) and thus do something for his own support. But from the severity of the weather, or other causes, his health declined, and he became so feeble as seldom to leave the house, and finally to lose all hope of ever being essentially better, though, from the nature of his disease, he may live a year or two. He is entirely destitute; and his friends here, solicitous that he shall have every comfort so long as he may need it, have proposed to raise five hundred dollars for his benefit. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Francis Jackson of Boston."

Foreign Convicts.—Three Germans were recently arrested in New York on suspicion of burglary—one of whom gave the following account of himself:—

I was born in Brunswick, Germany, and am 25 years of age; in the month of September, 1851, Henrich Hondrof, August Meyer, Ernest Brinker, and myself, were convicted of burglary, committed in the city of Brunswick, and were sentenced to the State Prison for a term of years; after remaining there until September last, we were all pardoned by the Duke of Brunswick, through the influence of a Society known as the "Directors," upon condition that we would immediately leave the country for the United States, never to return; accordingly we were all taken from prison by the Police and conveyed to Bremen, and there placed on board the brig Hiram, and kept under the surveillance of the Police until the vessel sailed; our passage was paid by the "Directors," and we each received from them $5; we landed in New York on the 1st of December last.

A Remarkable Man.—A London correspondent of the Western Christian Advocate, in noticing a late publication written by Rev. John Hunt, for many years a Wesleyan missionary in the Fejee Islands, gives the following brief view of the work accomplished by that eminent servant of Christ:—

John Hunt was, taking him for all in all, the most remarkable man in the Methodist ministry. A singularly stupid plough-boy, who could scarcely be intrusted with such simple errands as are usually performed by plough-boys, he might be seen sitting on the gate of a field, staring into vacuity. All at once, when the love of God touched his heart, the powers of a noble, dormant intellect, were aroused. He quickly learned to read and write, began to preach, and was recommended as a candidate for the ministry. When he came up to London for examination, every one said, "He is too raw; he must go home again," except Dr. Hannah, who begged to take him a while on trial at the theological institution; "for," said the doctor, "I believe there is something in him." He was right. John Hunt commenced a course of theological study; corrected his barbarous dialect; studied the Greek Testament on his knees, with prayers and tears; preached with amazing zeal and power; offered himself as a missionary to the Fejee Islands, then sunk in cannibalism; proved himself a superior linguist; reduced the barbarous jargon of those islands to a grammatical form; turned thousands from darkness to light; and expired, crying, "O, that I could run up to the top of Vewa hill, and fill the whole island with a shout of glory!"

Capt. Ericsson, of the Caloric ship, states that there is not the slightest cause for doubt in relation to this enterprise. The new engines are completed, and have been at work several days, their operation proving conclusively, that the practical difficulties which attended the first arrangement have all been overcome. The new engines are much reduced in size, whilst their principle of action is the same as before, with this exception only, that condensed atmospheric air is employed in place of the ordinary atmospheric, for producing the motive power. This modification admits of an increase of power, limited only by the capability of retaining the pressure in the machine.

The Richmond Herald of Dec. 15th says, On Lord's day, the pastor of the First church baptized 6 candidates—making, with the candidates from the meeting on Church Hill, an aggregate of 48. The pastor of the Second church baptized 6, making an aggregate of 66. The pastor of Grace Street church baptized 3, making an aggregate of 25.

Eld. M. P. Smith, in the South Western Baptist, reports the baptism of 90 candidates, in the four churches of which he has the pastoral care in Alabama. Shiloh church in the same State has had an addition of 25 by baptism. One Association in Alabama, at its annual meeting, reported the baptism of 236 members.

In a recent lecture, Dr. Bethune spoke of the mistakes which the best of reporters and printers will sometimes make. He had spoken in a sermon of the devil sowing tares, but found that the morning paper had it "the devil who saw many trees!" But he then records a worse treatment:—"I once said I was not by descent, but only ecclesiastically a Dutchman." Judge of my surprise, on learning from a newspaper that "I was only an ecclesiastical deduction."

Says a plain but powerful writer of our day, let parents who hate their offspring rear them to idleness and prodigality, and before long they will be stung by every vice, racked by its poison, and damned by its penalty. The remark is no less true than orthodox, and is just about as homely as it is wholesome.

Two persons who have chosen each other out of all the species, with the design to be each other's mutual comfort and entertainment, have in that very action bound themselves to be good humored, affable, joyful, forgiving, and patient, with respect to each other's frailties, to the end of their lives.

A boy, who was sent to inquire how an old lady named Wilkins was in health, said to her servant, "Missus wants to know how old Missus Wilkins is to-day?" to which the servant replied, "She is just seventy-four to-day."

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

In a subsequent vision, this apostle beholds with Christ, on Mount Zion, 144,000 who were redeemed from the earth, and in whose mouth "was found no guile; for they are without fault before the throne of God." (Rev. xiv. 1—5.) The number so seen on Mount Zion corresponds with that of those who are sealed against coming judgments seen in another vision, they being 12,000 of each tribe. And in that vision, (Rev. vii. 1—8,) the account of the angelic care of those who were sealed, "144,000 of all the tribes of the children of Israel," is immediately followed by by the apostle's being given a view likewise of "a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues," shouting the ascription of "salvation" to God and the Lamb. (Ver. 9—17.) They are arrayed in white robes, having "made them white in the blood of the Lamb;" and they are stated to have come "out of great tribulation," or rather, (the definite article being prefixed in the original,) "out of the great tribulation," identical, as the chronology of the vision leads us to believe, with the "time of trouble, such as never was nor shall be," already referred to as immediately preceding the Millennium.

This great multitude, then, consists of Gentiles redeemed from all nations, and therefore is distinct from the sealed Israelites. Accordingly, immediately succeeding the vision of the 144,000 who are "without fault," the Apostle saw another angel preaching the everlasting gospel "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgments is come; and worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." (Rev. xiv. 6, 7.) And while yet another angel proclaims the downfall of Babylon, and the awful doom of those "who worship the beast, and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name," it is immediately added, "Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Christ." (Ver. 8—12.) And that this also is at the end of our present dispensation, is indicated by the fact that this statement is followed immediately by that of the Son of Man's reaping the harvest of the earth. (Ver. 14—16.)

It is both interesting and encouraging to note the large numbers thus presented of true and faithful servants of God, who in the last times shall be found keeping the commandments of God, under the influence of the faith of Christ, of Gentile race as well as of the house of Israel—of the graft as well as of the good olive tree. And in the direct call to "worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters," there seems some indication of a special need to enforce then upon men, the claims of the Creator to due acknowledgment, and therefore of the importance, on the part of the people of God, of the rightful observance of that "commandment of God" which calls men to "remember the Sabbath day" on which He rested from all His work which God created and made. In the very testimony, therefore, that in the last times the acknowledged church will "keep the commandments of God," we have the assurance that, in the face of all opposition, and with the certainty of severe sufferings, there will be maintained the appointed protest against the prevailing atheism of those who shall be found refusing to acknowledge and "worship Him that made heaven and earth."

In so reasoning and insisting, we will not be understood as implying that Sabbath observance is the only duty—although it may be a testing one—nor as if forgetting that there are other commandments besides the fourth. But besides the relative importance of duties themselves, the neglect of any duty constitutes a reason for giving greater prominence to the calls for its discharge; and it will be acknowledged, that so long as any one of God's commandments is contravened, the church of Christ will not be "without fault." And we cannot but feel, that even now, in maintaining God's Sabbath cause, it is encouraging to observe that we have such an amount of evidence, that even before the dawn of the promised Millennium, "many" shall be so purified and made white, even although we also learn that they shall severely suffer for their faith and love.

To the same period does the prediction and injunction of the Saviour also seem to refer, when, foretelling to His apostles the events which shall precede and accompany His Second Coming, and enjoining upon those concerned, in reference to their flight to the mountains of Judea, "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." (Matt. xxiv. 20.) Not to the past Jewish troubles in the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans under Titus, but to those of the siege which is yet to come after Israel's restoration to their land, we now believe, does the Saviour here allude. In the corresponding Gospel, Luke, briefly enumerating the events of the entire period of the captivity and dispersion of the Jews, specifies similar circumstances in relation to the first siege also—as indeed there are many wonderful coincidences between the past and future dealings of the Lord with that wonderful people. And as truly as Jerusalem was compassed about by the Roman army, so truly does the Lord declare that He will yet "gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished; and half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city." (Zech. xiv. 2.) And, in the Gospel by Matthew, the words which we have quoted seem to stand related to the judgments at the end of the world or age, preparatory to which the "gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations." (Ver. 14, 15.) The flight spoken of as interfering with the due observance of the Sabbath, is even placed in immediate connection with the standing in the holy place of "the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet;" and the flight itself is in that "great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." (Ver. 21.) This time of greatest trouble, (for there cannot be two times of greatest trouble,) we have already seen from the prophet Daniel himself, is not at the beginning of the Jewish captivity, but at its close, when Michael the great prince shall stand up in their behalf. From the relation, therefore, in which these events are thus placed, the great tibulation, and the siege, and the flight which it occasions, seem all to be future, and when "the day of the Lord cometh," as testified by Zechariah. Even if viewed as referring to the time when Titus invested the holy city, our Lord's warning would imply the continuance of "the Sabbath day" until that time; and that, consequently, it had not been changed by the apostles, or during their life time. But if the flight for which prayer is to be made that it be not on the Sabbath day, is still future, then does the Saviour intimate the continuing obligation to the end of the present dispensation of the same Sabbath that His disciples then acknowledged, and which He himself observed when upon the earth—calling it still, prospectively, as He here does, "the Sabbath day," He also intimates thus, farther, the recognition by his people at that time of their obligation to sanctify that same Sabbath—and the period referred to is that immediately preceding that of the Millennial day.

As already remarked concerning the prophecy of Daniel, that all the events of which he there speaks have special relation to his own people of Israel, so it is to be observed, that our Saviour, in the prediction from which we have quoted, is also addressing His Jewish apostles; and that Zechariah, in like manner, plainly enough intimates, that it is from the city of Jerusalem that half shall flee when it shall be encompassed by all nations. In all these three cases, direct reference is made to the circumstances of those of the house of Israel, partly converted to the faith of Christ, and partly in sad rejection of Him. And as it is believing Jews that Jesus must be understood as addressing through their representative brethren, the apostles, even when He said concerning the former siege, "When ye see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh," so does He, through the same apostles, seem to address their believing brethren, when, in reference to the last and greatest tribulation, He exhorts, "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." But although this period is that of Israel's crisis, and our Lord points to circumstances descriptive of Israel's future condition, yet is this the period of the world's crisis also; and the statements and warnings of the Lord may also be made available by the son of the stranger who has been purged and made white, and has laid hold on God's covenant, and enjoys the blessing of the Sabbath, and who with the people of Israel may be then present in Jerusalem, when half of the city shall flee as they fled before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah King of Judah, and such may even be of the residue of the people who "shall not be cut off from the city." Zech. xiv. 2.

LUTHER'S IDEA OF A GOOD PREACHER.

1. He should preach orderly.
2. He should have a ready wit.
3. He should be eloquent.
4. He should have a good vein.
5. He should have a good memory.
6. He should know when to make end.
7. He should be sure of what he advances.
8. He should venture and engage body and blood, wealth and honor, for the word.
9. He should suffer himself to be buffeted and mocked by every one.

A PREACHER TO PLEASE THE WORLD.

1. He must be learned.
2. He must have a fine delivery.
3. He must have neat and quaint words.
4. He must be a proper person, whom the women may fancy.
5. He must not take, but give money.
6. He must preach such things as people willingly hear.

I would not have preachers, says Luther, torment their hearers with long and tedious preaching. When I am in the pulpit, I regard neither doctors or magistrates, of whom about forty are here in the church; but I have an eye to the multitudes of young people, children and servants, of whom there are above two thousand.

Christ taught by parables, that all could understand, and this is the art of speaking. Phillip Melancthon and Justus Jonas are both learned men, and well skilled in the Scriptures. I would not make a step into the pulpit for them.

It is said that Melancthon on one occasion arose to preach a sermon on the text, "I am the good shepherd." On looking around upon his numerous and respectable audience, his natural timidity overcame him, and he could only repeat the text over and over again. Luther, who was in the desk with him, at length exclaimed, "You are a very good sheep!" and telling him to sit down, took the same text, and preached an excellent discourse from it.

Dr. Johnson, when in the fullness of years and knowledge, said: "I never took up a newspaper without finding something I would have deemed it a loss not to have seen; never without deriving from it instruction and amusement."

NOW.

Arise! for the day is passing,
  While you lie dreaming on;
Your brothers are cased in armor,
  And forth to the fight are gone;
Your place in the ranks awaits you;
  Each man has a part to play;
The past and the future are nothing
  In the face of the stern to-day.

Arise from your dreams of the future—
  Of gaining a hard-fought field;
Of storming the airy fortress;
  Of bidding the giant yield;
Your future has deeds of glory,
  Of honor (God grant it may!)
But your arm will never be stronger,
  Or needed as now—to-day.

Arise! if the past detain you,
  Her sunshine and storms forget;
No chains so unworthy to hold you
  As those of a vain regret;
Sad or bright, she is lifeless ever;
  Cast her phantom arms away,
Nor look back, save to learn the lesson
  Of a nobler strife to-day.

Arise! for the hour is passing;
  The sound that you dimly hear,
Is your enemy marching to battle,
  Rise! rise! for the foe is here!
Stay not to brighten your weapons,
  Or the hour will strike at last;
And, from dreams of a coming battle,
  You will waken and find it past.

[Household Words.

From the Christian Chronicle.

"BAPTISMAL WELCOME."

The above term, "Baptismal Welcome," I find employed, in a most equivocal sense, yet not without a sinister purpose, in Dr. Stork's "Children of the New Testament." The work of Dr. Stork, with slight qualification, is a truly attractive volume, containing some of the most beautiful touches of the renewed soul, and offering some of the most profitable lessons to the human heart, but which is distorted, greatly, by perverting its spirit-entrancing subject, with party glosses, to commend the unscriptural fallacy of "infant baptism"—a flimsy excrescence imposed upon the world by a corrupt hierarchy, to the utter surprise of all frank and erudite inquirers into the laws and the duties of the Gospel Church; save the bigoted, who are determined, "convinced against their will," to adhere, pertinaciously, to "the inventions of man,"—against reason and revelation, to uphold the disingenuous prejudices of a favorite dogma.

It is not my design to pen a review of that deeply interesting volume, maugre the unjustifiable sectarian cheat, so injudiciously, yet so astutely perpetrated, or to enter upon a discussion of that perverted institution, so stealthily introduced, which mars the production to a numerous reading community—the million of Baptists—throughout the United States; who, generally, hold like sentiments with Dr. Stork, on all other matters discussed so cogently and so charmingly, in his absorbing volume.

It is a pity, a great pity, indeed, that so excellent a work, save eight pages of it—from 100 to 107—so awkwardly and so irrelevantly obtruded, in so Catholic a treatise, should exclude it from free circulation by the largest denomination of adult believers in our country; yet it is a book, with all its faults, I love, exceedingly, and that I may exhibit its beauties to others without violating my conscientious regard for scriptural truth, I have had to resort to appending a few notes to it, as an antidote to its insidious poison; and as I should like to enable the Baptists to circulate it, without being guilty of propagating error, radical error, I add them, here, that they may be pasted in the book, to which references can be made on each respective page where the error stands recorded.

1. On page 100, Dr. Stork assumes that, "Among the first things to be done by the believing mother for her child, is its presentation to Christ in BAPTISM."

Note 1. As instituted by a corrupt church, in a corrupt age, without being sanctioned by a single precept or example in the New Testament.

Before passing on I must remark, that the injunction, above given by the author, for mothers to present their children, in that manner, is dragged into the history of Timothy, with whom it has not anything whatever to do, as there is not a shadow of allusion to it in the scriptural account of his good training by his mother, Eunice. That is the weak, scraggy sprout on which he has attempted to engraft such an error, such an innovation, and such a fallacy.

2. On the same page the author adds: "If infants, by express direction of God, were admitted by circumcision into the Jewish church, why may they not now be received into the Christian fold by baptism?"

Note 2. Because in the Jewish church, or commonwealth, they were admitted in virtue of their birth-right, clearly enjoined, while under the gospel economy, admission into the Christian Church by baptism is restricted to believers on the Lord Jesus Christ, of which an infant is incapable; and because the Apostles did not understand or regard Christian baptism as "coming in the place of circumcision," as here assumed; therefore there is no authority for it, nor any consistency in practicing it. I might adduce many extracts from distinguished Pedobaptist commentators, to show that that idea is repudiated by some of the most prominent writers among themselves. It must suffice to name two—Dr. Emmons, of New England, took this ground in replying to Dr. Hemmenway, one of his own brethren; and more recently Dr. Halley, of England, candidly acknowledges: "I have, and ought to confess it, candidly, some serious objections to the acknowledgment of baptism as a substitute for circumcision. The general opinion that baptism is substituted for circumcision, as a kind of hereditary seal of the covenant of grace, appears to be ill-sustained by scriptural evidence, and to be exposed to some very serious if not fatal objections." Bushnell's "theory of organic unity to infant baptism," introduced by Dr. Stork, is the counterpart of Dr. Schaff's "con-corporation" —par nobile fratum. Dr. Stork had better establish Dr. Schaff before he attempts to endorse Bushnell.

3. On page 101, Dr. Stork continues: "The church is essentially the same in all ages, and the ancient promise is still made "to us and our children."

Note 3. This is as garbled and far-fetched as it is erroneous, and is as much repudiated by well posted up Pedobaptists as we could desire. Dr. Whitby, (Pedo.) says: "These words will not prove a right of infants to receive baptism; the promise mentioned here being that only of the Holy Ghost, mentioned in verses 16, 17, 18, and so relating only to the times of the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost, and to those persons who by age were made capable of these extraordinary gifts." The same view is taken, and satisfactorily sustained, by Dr. Doddridge, Dr. Owen, Dr. Hammond, and scores of equal authority among the Pedobaptists.

4. On page 102, the author adds: "Every act of Christ in relation to children, and his repeated declaration, that of such is the kingdom of heaven, justifies the conclusion, that he would not bid the little ones stand without the sacred fold."

Note 4. Neither would the writer; but it is the Master's province, only, to ordain and revoke church institutions, and if he had designed infants to be baptized, he had a most fitting opportunity to direct it and impress it by his example, for his disciples to imitate; but when He said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God," he used no water—he ordained no water—he simply laid his hands upon them and blessed them. So says the New Testament, and as it says no more, the man who arrogates to himself power to mend the doings of our Saviour, must possess the most consummate presumption and self-righteous hardihood. "No more, nor less," is the only legitimate rule for the humble servants of the Most High.

The remainder of the tainted pages alluded to, are made up mostly of poetical quotations from Pedobaptist minstrels—a much more fertile field to sustain their glaring fallacy than the New Testament. But I have not taken up my pen to review that fallacy in extenso, but simply to inquire into the import of the term "baptismal welcome," which stands in the following connection in Dr. Stork's work: "When a new-born soul is added to your household—a new rose-bud to your bosom—a bright particular star dropped from the upper sphere, and dazzling in your diadem, your conscious love to God will give the heavenly visitant the truest, the most prophetic, and most blessed baptismal welcome."

We shall not enter into the philology of the word baptize or baptism, for men in the present day cannot trace the etymology of a word, and particularly a scriptural one, save through sectarian lens. Before sectarian glasses were invented, which invert and pervert all doctrines and ordinances, just to suit a particular school of divinity, common sense, generally, gave them a plain, honest, unmutilated rendering. Thus, Luther, Calvin, Beza, Grotius, Vitringa, Salmasius, Buddeus, Witsius, Venema, Alstedius, Le Clerc, Vossius, Selden, Baxter, Wesley, Whitfield, Dr. Doddridge, Dr. Campbell, Dr. Wall, Bishop Burnet, Bishop Bossuet, Bishop Taylor, Bishop Pearce, and scores of other Pedobaptist scholars, gave it the unqualified rendering, immerse, immersion, or frankly admitted that immerse and immersion were the primitive meanings and the primitive practice; still, in the present day of polemic quibbling, we have myriads, without the learning, and without the candor of their predecessors, who doggedly deny and denounce their frank admissions, and quibble forever about nothing, so that an attempt to elucidate the true import of the word by inquiring into its philology, would involve an endless, and perhaps an unprofitable task; but we sometimes have mooted matters elucidated by similies and synonymes; therefore, leaving the quibblers to their quibbling, we turn to the Apostle Paul, to ascertain how he represents the ordinance to the common understanding in an equivalent figure. In the sixth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, he likens baptism unto a burial—"Buried with him in baptism;" of which Whitby, (Pedo.) gives the following paraphrase: "Therefore, we are buried with him in baptism, [by plunging us under the water] into [a conformity to his] death, [which put his body under the earth."]

If then baptism signifies, or typifies, a burial, how does a birth figure a "baptismal welcome?" It is a contradiction, an absurdity; unless in "all the changes and chances of this mortal life" we retrograde, and go back to the custom of the Thracians, who wept at a birth, and danced at the grave, or adopt the revolting sacrifice of the Hindoo mother, who casts her offspring into the Ganges. That may be a truly "baptismal welcome," to the alligator and the sea-tiger; but what it can legitimately import in the way used, I cannot divine. If he designs a "christening" by the term, which he most probably does, it is, certainly, one of the greatest fallacies ever invented by man, and one of the greatest absurdities ever adopted by sensible men, with their eyes open to scriptural testimony. One thing is evident, the child does not regard it as a welcome. It struggles and bawls lustily against it, and thus, unmistakably, manifests his disapprobation and his repugnance to it. It is much like a saying among school boys: "You may think it fun, but poking a fellow's fingers into one's eyes is no fun." Welcome has been defined, from the days of Sheridan: "To salute a new comer with kindness." But does the child regard the ordeal they force it through as a kind salutation? All experience proves it to be a misnomer, and the ceremony an absurdity, because the scriptures declare baptism to be "the answer of a good conscience toward God," and when applied to a child incompetent to conscientious response, it is worse than nugatory, and therefore becomes an absurdity.

But while we cannot find any proper interpretation of the above expression—"baptismal welcome," in the form in which it is used by Dr. Stork, it has a significance, and a right proper significance, when properly used. Baptism is the appointed ordinance of admission of believers into the Christian church, and when numbers, or even a single penitent comes to his right mind, and takes on Christ by baptism, the church as a body, and every individual ransomed soul thereof, throbs with delight at the occurrence, and gives to the baptized new comer a hearty welcome to their fraternity. In most of the Baptist churches, this act is manifested publicly by the pastor extending the right hand of fellowship to the candidate, on behalf of the church. This is one mode of legitimate "baptismal welcome;" but there are two other modes, closely allied, which express it in acts still better. The first obtains among the English Seventh-day Baptists in Virginia, where the brethren, individually, give the hand immediately after baptism; and the second is practiced by the German Baptists of this country, and especially by the German Seventh-day Baptists. When a male candidate goes down into the water, the male members arrange themselves at the water's edge, and after the ordinance is completed by the pastor, namely, immersing him three times—in name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost—laying hands upon him with prayer, while he remains on his knees in the water, and then giving him the right hand of fellowship, and imprinting the "holy kiss"—the members meet him as he comes up out of the water, or so soon as his clothing has been changed, and each gives him the hand and the kiss, as an earnest of having become, personally, received into mystic brotherhood with each individual. When the candidate is a female, the same welcome is given in the same manner, by the sisters. This is truly and emphatically, a "baptismal welcome,"—to salute a new comer with kindness. This speaks to the heart, and sends out a response from the heart, which knits them together "as the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul;" or, as the Apostle Paul expresses it, "being knit together in love." This is the true baptismal welcome, the genuine Christian welcome, and the legitimate gospel welcome.

BORDENTOWN, Jan. 12, 1854.

TWO SCHOLARS OF WESTMINSTER.

During the wars between Charles I. and the Parliament, and when the cause of the latter was triumphing in every direction over that of the royalists, Sir Patrick Newcastle was one of the magistrates specially commissioned to try, as rebels, all prisoners taken with arms in their hands. He was a man of strict moral character and undeviating integrity, based on the only stable foundation, true religious principle. A constitution naturally feeble and sickly had not permitted him to serve in the army; but he powerfully aided the Parliamentary cause by his great talent and sound judgment, and was not only distinguished by Cromwell with peculiar favor, but generally respected and esteemed as the most active, intelligent, and equitable magistrate in the country.

One evening a party of friends was assembled at his house in honor of his birth-day, and Sir Patrick was gaily supping with them and his family, when a body of soldiers brought in a royalist whom they had just taken prisoner. It was an officer, who after the defeat of the King's troops, was endeavoring to make his way to the coast, in the hope of escaping to France. Sir Patrick ordered him to be introduced into the room, and a cover to be placed for him, courteously inviting him to take his place at the board. "This is my birth-day," he said, "and I must not have its good cheer marred by being obliged to enact the part of judge. Will you, sir, for a few hours, try and forget you are not a voluntary guest?"

And it seemed as if the prisoner had caught up the good-knight's tone, and was willing to play his part, both in the good cheer on the board and the hilarity around it; for he addressed himself to his supper with appetite, and to his host and the guests with cheerful courtesy.

Sir Patrick now resumed the subject from which he had been diverted by the interruption. "As I was saying, at fifteen I was such a poor puny creature, that every one either despised my weakness, or took advantage of it to trample upon me. At home, I was exposed to the harshest treatment from a relative; and, between my school fellows and a severe master, I was little better off when I went to Westminster school. Courage in a child is generally little more than the consciousness of his own strength, and my weakness rendered me a coward, so that I literally lived in a continual terror of the brute force that, in some form or other, was perpetually assailing me. I became daily more sensitive to pain, and that to such a degree, that perhaps not one here could even conceive. The master's formidable rod had already twice left me almost without power to use my hands; and so terrible was my recollection of it, that the mere thought of being again exposed to its chastisement, made me tremble from head to feet.

"I told you I was a pupil at Westminster. In my school room the classes were divided merely by a curtain, which we were positively forbidden to touch. One very hot summer's day sleep completely overpowered me while listening to a lecture on some passages in Aristotle from one of the masters, and I was quietly dozing on the form, when a sudden movement in the class awoke me. I started, and was about to fall forward, when, to save myself, I caught at the curtain, and, to my great consternation, tore it down the middle. For some moments the teachers and the boys in the two classes, now no longer divided, stood gazing at each other through the rent. Suspicion at once fell upon me and another boy, as being nearest the curtain when the mischief was done; but my confusion was too evident to allow any doubt as to the culprit, and I was angrily ordered to the middle of the room, and desired to hold out my hand for a dozen slaps.

"I staggered forward as if I were drunk, with my knees knocking together, and the drops of perspiration rolling down my face, while terror so paralyzed my tongue that, when I would have begged for pardon, I could not get out a word. Already was the dreaded instrument of punishment uplifted, when I heard the cry of 'Hold! do not touch him; I cannot let him bear the punishment.' The speaker was the lad whose place in the class was at the other side of the curtain. I knew not whether the master was indifferent as to who the real culprit was, provided he had some one upon whom to inflict exemplary punishment; but certain it is, that my deliverer was brought up, and received a round dozen. My first impulse was to own all, and to arrest the unmerited punishment; but my courage failed me, and having once allowed the first blow to be given, I was ashamed to speak. How false that shame was, how great my moral cowardice, I now see, my friends, as clearly as you do.

"After bearing, bravely, the penalty of a fault he had not committed, the generous boy, as he returned to his form, passed close to me, and while my eyes were riveted on his poor wounded hands, he whispered, with a smile I shall never forget: 'Do not be caught meddling with the curtain again, my little man; for I can tell you the master hits hard when provoked.'

"I fell on my knees, and sobbed till I was sent out of the room. From that time forth I became so ashamed of my cowardice and nervous weakness, that I determined to make every effort to conquer it; and I trust, by the blessing of God, I have at length succeeded."

"And I think you told us," said one of the guards, "that you have never seen the noble and generous boy since?"

"Never, I am sorry to say. He was not in my class, and I almost immediately after, and very suddenly, removed from Westminster. I assure you, my friends, continued Sir Patrick—and as he spoke the tears were in his eyes—I assure you, my friends, I would give up much of my fortune to be permitted to see him once more. I trust I may yet have this happiness."

At this moment the royalist prisoner said: "I assure you, your memory fails you somewhat, for it was not one dozen, but a good two dozen that the master gave me. I got it on the double allowance for not coming forward at once."

"It is quite true—I remember it well," said the magistrate. "But can it indeed be possible that I at length behold him whom I have so much longed to see? Yes, yes, it is he; I recognize the features; nay, the voice seems scarcely changed. But in what a position do I behold you? in what uniform?"

"In the uniform of my King, Sir Patrick, and in the position prescribed by my duty as a subject; and best befitting a gentleman and a cavalier. I followed my father to the camp of Charles; and my father died in his service. If a similar fate be mine, it is only, I think, as it ought to be."

And [illegible] resumed the seat from which he had risen to make himself known to his host, and quietly went on eating his supper.

During the remainder of the evening, Sir Patrick was absent and absorbed in thought, and that night he left the castle without mentioning to any one in what direction he was going, or the object of his sudden journey.

At the end of three days he returned and ordered the royalist officer to be brought before him, who, during his absence, had, by his orders, been treated with every possible consideration. The prisoner was the first to speak: "I implore you, by the memory of the past, as the only favor I can now ask at earthly hands, to end this dreadful suspense, and to let me know my fate, be it what it may; nothing can be worse than this delay. I have to thank you for your kindly courtesy; but I had rather not stay too long with you, lest I might learn to regret life."

"Lord D——," said the magistrate, in tones of deep emotion, "twenty years ago you showed me your hands, and said to me, 'Do not be caught meddling with the curtain again, for I can tell you the master hits hard when provoked;' and to-day I show you your pardon, signed by him who is now the master in England; and in turn I say to you, Do not be caught again with arms against the Parliament, for I can tell you Cromwell hits hard when provoked."

At these words Sir Patrick and Lord D—— threw themselves into each other's arms, and sealed with this embrace a friendship which, notwithstanding the difference of their political opinions, remained uninterrupted during the rest of their lives.

A DYING MAN'S GOD.

I knew the old man; he was rich, and his riches were his God. I rode in company with him a considerable distance through his possessions. I sought means to turn the conversation from his groves and his orchards, his fields and his treasures, to something serious and profitable. But no—his heart was on these things; they engrossed his thoughts and his affections. He was between eighty and ninety years of age, and yet I could not bring him for a moment to speak of leaving his earthly inheritance. To the Sabbath and the sanctuary, and all the things of God, he was an utter stranger.

It was painful to see an old man, just ready to close his eyes on all that belongs to earth, refusing to admit into his mind a single thought of death, or of that eternity so shortly to be his home. With a kind of melancholy satisfaction, I saw him take a different road from myself, thus releasing me from my fruitless efforts to direct his mind towards that world where his real interests lay.

Not long after this interview, disease attacked his mortal frame, giving no doubtful intimation that the machine which had been in motion for more than four-score years, was about to stand still. As he lay struggling with death, he spoke of fields of corn, and then said, "Bring me my bundle of notes." Inspecting one of them, he said with earnestness, "I believe we shall not lose it," or that effect. While he lay, holding his notes and obligations before his face, in his withered hands—he died!

Our possessions are wholly in our performances. He owns nothing to whom the world owes nothing.

DIFFERENCES AMONG CHRISTIANS—CHRIST ALL IN ALL.

We do not suppose, that what is popularly termed Sectarianism admits of any remedy, in the present state of things. Absolute indifference to the points which separate the several denominations of Christians from one another, cannot exist. The man who is truly honest, is a Baptist, or Methodist, or Presbyterian, not because he was educated so, but because he supposes the Word of God requires it. He connects himself with the church which is, in his opinion, most nearly conformed to the pattern given in the New Testament, and refuses the communion of all others, because they appear to have departed from this pattern. He cannot, if he is an honest man, say that he loves all denominations alike; for that would be to say, in effect, that he has connected himself with the church to which he belongs, not on scriptural grounds, but because it best suited his convenience. So long, therefore, as there is honesty of principle among Christians, there will be different persuasions, till the Spirit of Truth shall have destroyed all error, and brought the disciples of the Lord to see eye to eye.

The same honesty which leads Christians to divide from one another into different persuasions, leads also to mutual discussion of their differences. The Baptist feels it a duty which he owes to God, to expose the error of his Pedobaptist brethren. The Congregationalist is governed by a sense of duty to the Head of the Church, when he makes Presbyterianism, or Prelacy, the subject of animadversion. The Sabbatarian controverts earnestly the principles of those who regard the first day of the week as holy time, because he cannot otherwise be true in his allegiance to the Lord of the Sabbath. So the work of discussion goes on, and the unreflecting think, that the time spent in it might be better employed. But as it is impossible for the true-hearted Christian to feel indifferent whether his fellow creatures are true or false in their allegiance to the Saviour, he cannot altogether hold his peace.

Yet we apprehend that, in these days of excitement, there is a tendency to magnify some of these points of difference beyond their relative importance. In saying this, we would not be understood as intimating, that [illegible] which is a matter of revelation, however small, is unimportant. The distinction of duties into essential and non essential, has no justification in our mind. Every thing which God commands is essential to the perfection of our obedience, while nothing is essential to our justification but the righteousness of Christ. But what kind of a Christian would he be, who should say, 'I will swear, and steal, and commit adultery, if I choose, because it is not by my own merits that I am to be justified, but solely by the righteousness of another?' Yet when we hear one pleading this excuse for neglect of Baptism, the Sabbath, and other commanded duties, we cannot forbear thinking, that he may be one of this kind.

We are free, nevertheless, to admit that, in our zeal to defend the principles which distinguish us from other Christians, we may overrate their importance, as compared with that which is, after all, the great central truth of Christianity. Christ and Him crucified—Christ a Sacrifice for our sins—Christ the Lord our Righteousness—is that central truth, which must ever be made prominent in whatever labors we resort to for the salvation of mankind. And (if we must say it) we are fearful that Seventh-day Baptists, taken as a body, are not as solemnly impressed, and as deeply penetrated, with this idea, as they ought to be. Not that we would insinuate their want of orthodoxy in regard to the doctrine; for we suppose there are but few among us, whose creed is substantially defective in this respect. But we fear that too much reliance has been placed upon what may have been regarded as subsidiary props and appendages to the doctrine, accompanied with a sort of distrust of the power of the doctrine when presented in its naked simplicity. It has not been felt to be all in all. It is loved, it is true, but not so loved as to make us comparatively indifferent to our denominational peculiarity. We say comparatively; for absolute indifference we would by no means inculcate. But as a power to save souls, the Sabbath, Baptism, and every thing else, sinks into perfect nothingness in comparison with it.

It is our conviction, that if Seventh-day Baptists could be made to feel more deeply the importance of this doctrine, and to give themselves more heartily to the work of propagating it, feeling something like an apostolic "heaviness and continual sorrow of heart" for those who have not yet received it, they would soon see more converts to the Sabbath, and more numerous accessions to their churches, than they have ever found to result from their most intense anxiety about their denominational peculiarity. Let us see that Christ is preached, and God will take care of the Sabbath for us. The work of controversy with other Christians would be greatly lessened, if we were comparatively less anxious about it, and more anxious to magnify the Lord Jesus as the only Saviour of the world.

PARENTAL DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES.

The relation existing between parent and child is the most intimate and important, perhaps, of all earthly relations, except one, that of husband and wife. Upon one side, the relation is one involving care, guidance, and control; and upon the other, of absolute dependence. What a tiny thing is an infant man! How wide the extremes, whether physical, mental, or moral, between the infant state and that of full-developed manhood! And how much the child is dependent upon the parent for the character of these future developments, who can tell? And yet all this being is worth to humanity is depending upon this development. I think it is not saying too much to affirm, that an error committed by parents in the physical training of their children, even in things that to many seem unimportant, may be so far fatal, that many succeeding generations may intervene before a redemption may be thoroughly wrought out. I wish, therefore, in calling your attention to the theme indicated by the heading of this article, to speak first of the necessity of giving your children a thorough physical education. I do not propose to write an essay upon the laws of health. My wish is simply to do as above indicated, i. e., to call your minds to your duty concerning this feature of their education.

If in this branch of their education, a radical defect manifests itself, every other power, either for enjoyment or service, will thereby be diminished. The necessity for a healthy and vigorous constitution, in order to the enduring of the burdens and performing the toils of our present mode of existence, is so apparent, that it would seem a superfluity to even call it to notice. Yet how many, either by neglect, cruel impositions of service, or a yielding to absurd and vicious customs and fashions, not only destroy the powers of their children, and create a condition of inability, but also produce ill health, suffering, and death. In this do not parents sin? 1. Do they not sin against their own interests and enjoyments, while they multiply their cares and the costs incident to the rearing of a family? 2. Do they not sin in bringing unnecessary pains and other physical suffering upon their offspring? 3. Do they not sin against society, by bringing upon it an unnecessary tax and burden?

Not only is the physical constitution made to suffer by this vicious or imperfect training, and its cares and wants increased, but the faculties of the mind and soul are thereby depraved. The body bears a relation to the soul resembling that of the eye to the body. If the eye is diseased, the whole body is "full of darkness." So, if the body is in certain ways diseased, the functions of the mind and soul are greatly impaired. Would you have your children possessed of well-furnished and well-balanced minds, remember that it is of vital importance that their physical constitutions be thoroughly and evenly developed. THE HEART.

There is a physical heart—the great center and regulator of the circulatory system—the clock that keeps time for the crimson tide of life to flow by. There is also a spiritual heart—the seat of all our emotions, motives, and feelings—the soul of the human mind—the fountain of joy, sorrow, hatred, hope, fear, gratitude, pride—emotions of beauty and sublimity—the source of goodness.

In searching for the springs of action, in individuals or communities—in studying human nature—the heart is the map on which to mark out our latitude and longitude—the clew by which we are to unravel the enigmas of humanity.

If we were made up of calm, cold, calculating intellect alone—if we were all head and no heart—we might as well have been created soulless marble; but we are feeling, impulsive beings. We are influenced by every thing around us. We meet long absent friends, and we rejoice. Good fortune comes to us, and we are glad. Affliction hovers around us, and we mourn. Serpent-tongued slander poisons our good name, and we are sad. There is a mutual exchange of good offices, of kindly feelings, and gratitude, and friendship springing up. Another sorrows, and we are melted to pity. We see a noble, generous action, and we admire and love. We listen to the magic of sweet sounds, and we are delighted. We see a rainbow, a waterfall, a golden cloud, a tiny flower, and we call them beautiful. We stand on the edge of a fearful precipice, look on Niagara, on old Ocean, and emotions of grandeur and sublimity fill our souls.

There is a great difference, depending upon nature and education, in regard to susceptibility of emotion. Almost daily we meet with every grade, with every shade of mind—from the finely-molded, sensitive spirit, down to the heartless stoic—from him whose emotions come and go "like ripples on a summer's lake," to him who lives without a tear—from the overflowing eye, the flushing cheek, the quivering lip, the warm, glowing heart, to him whose very look would freeze the gushing fountains of affection. He that carries with him the most heart, that has most in common with humanity, carries with him a mighty power for weal or woe to all that know him. This is why one speaker effects more than another. The one perhaps has more pure intellect, the better education, reasons better, convinces the judgment, yet never moves to action. The other turns us as by magic, melts hearts of rock, and molds them as he wills—pierces the mailed jackets of our old prejudices with arrows of truth—because he brings an earnest heart to the work. This decides us in our choice of friends. From all with whom we are acquainted, we select one as more especially ours. Nature has not been more lavish of her gifts to him, than she has to others; but still we love him better. If asked why, we can scarcely tell—we know that we confide in him more than we could dream of doing in another. We say he is a congenial spirit. Strange term, though fraught with a wealth of meaning—a genial spirit—one that goes forth with us, breathing the same atmosphere with like inspiration, who looks upon yonder rich sunset with the same rapture, whose soul beats with the same high resolves, or blends into harmony with ours when touched by the same mysterious influences. Oh! a heart is there, speaking to our heart of hearts.

No part of our nature is more susceptible of cultivation than this; and there are reasons more than we can name, why it should be trained to every noble and generous impulse—why the best affections of our nature should be most earnestly cultivated.

A good heart brings contentment and happiness to our own bosoms; it warms like the genial sunshine all who find themselves near us; and especially it helps us to judge more truthfully the motives and acts of others. The world is full of the true and the good, and if our hearts are cold or evil we misjudge them. We can not well get above ourselves as a standard. If we are selfish, can not appreciate whole-souled benevolence. We might possibly think of it in the abstract; but when applied to the great and virtuous among us, we are apt to doubt. Our vision is so dimmed by selfishness, that we could not see, though their faces should shine like Moses' face, when they like him commune with Deity. Christ was condemned as the chief of impostors, because his judges could not believe that one who walked and talked with them, could be truly God. So when we find ourselves harshly judging others, we may well mistrust self.

Kind words! how they tell for happiness! A single word—it costs nothing, yet it often causes the heart to bound with new life—the tear of gratitude to flow; whilst a harsh word, a look of neglect or scorn, will burn like red-hot iron into our souls. Seest thou that trembling, sensitive child of poverty, as she walks among us? The scathing shafts of scorn have pierced her soul—the darts of derision have torn her heart, and left it quivering, bleeding. The chill of neglect has caused her to shiver in solitude, or shudder at the approach of a footstep. She is not prepossessing in appearance, it is true; yet all acknowledge that she has a warm, confiding heart. If perchance, now and then, she finds a sympathizing spirit, she pours out the pent-up fountains. She gives [illegible] of love and kindness without stint. But more oft she wanders on unknown, unappreciated—her eye looks more steadily heavenward, until her tried and wounded spirit closes its eye on its earthly trials, and the glories of heaven open upon her view. Then will here and there one rise up and call her blessed; even those who were wont to ridicule, will perhaps acknowledge the heavenlike influence.

We repeat, that it is in our power to mold aright this most vital part of our being—to tune to sweetest melody this "harp of a thousand strings." Trifles light as air may mar its richest notes for all time. All our reading and study—all our associations—every thought that we cherish, though it may be but like a drop in the bucket, yet it goes to make up the great fountain of spiritual life or death. The heart is especially the "child of hope" to our future; yet we are apt to strain every nerve to feed, clothe, and beautify the intellect, whilst we entirely neglect the heart. We not only neglect its cultivation, but we are apt to indulge in habits that seriously injure this fine-strung instrument—that freeze up the warmest outgushings of our better natures. All unwarranted prejudices, envy, jealousy, slander, and ridicule, wither and blight the fairest blossoms in the garden of the heart.

Could one of a truly refined soul bear to torture the smallest of insects for the sake of seeing it suffer? How much less could they endure to give pain to an immortal spirit! How careful then should we be of our words, of our looks—careful of the thoughts and feelings that we cherish. With another we can say, "A heart trained to sympathize with the finest touches of feeling, will not breathe a sentiment, say a word, give an expression, that can injure another, or send a thrill of pain to their bosom—would not meaningly cast a shadow over a happy heart, or throw aside the smile that loves to linger on a pleasant countenance."

Next to our associations, our reading does most, perhaps, to cultivate our hearts for good or evil. In this age, deluged with books, there is ample room for selection. If ten thousand lives were added to ours, we could not read all that is written; then why not always select the best? History, Biography, Poetry, Fiction, all kinds of writings, swarm from our presses like the locusts of Egypt. None, from the least to the greatest, need go unsatisfied. But especially ought the Bible to claim our attention. In comparison to it, Byron loses his fire, Milton his soarings, Gray his beauties, and Homer his grandeur. Its words are pictures of immortality, fruit from the tree of knowledge, and pearls of celestial thought from the river of life.

Affliction and sorrow are also great purifiers of the heart. No one can be fully developed till he has drank deep draughts from the cup of sorrow. God has wisely so ordered it, that sooner or later, we all drink of this cup. Previous to this we may love God and man—we may sympathize with the mourner; and the tone of our souls is but the higher, lighter notes of sorrow, that lie along next to the happy and jubilant; but when sorrow comes, then the deep, full organ notes of the soul are stirred—then the sanctified heart reveals its richness, depth, and purity. Before this it may go singing to itself, like some pure sparkling brook; but after, it gushes up, like Siloa's fount, fast by the oracles of God.

MISSIONARY MEETING.

In pursuance of an invitation from the brethren in Westerly, R. I., the Committee on Outfit would give notice, that a meeting is appointed to be held at the meeting-house of the Pawcatuck Seventh-day Baptist Church, on the 8th of February, (fourth day of the week,) at 2 o'clock P. M., at which time it is expected a discourse will be preached by Eld. Lucius Crandall, and such other exercises take place as will be suited to the occasion of the expected departure of our missionaries to Palestine. The occasion will be one of deep interest to all the friends of the Mission, and a goodly number will doubtless be present from distant and neighboring churches, to participate in the exercises.

Eld. Jones and family will leave New York early the present week for Westerly, and will probably remain there till near the time of sailing, which, it is expected, will be about the 15th of February, from Boston. It is not known which of the vessels now daily expected to arrive will be dispatched first; therefore the Committee are not able to announce at this time the name of the vessel in which our devoted brethren will be borne to their oriental home.

CHINA—ORIGIN OF THE REVOLUTION.

At a recent quarterly meeting of the London Missionary Society, a statement was read in relation to the early operations of that Society in China, which gives a view, somewhat different from that heretofore published, of the origin of the Revolution. The following is an extract:—

The years in which the labors of the London Missionary Society were necessarily restricted to the Archipelago, were indeed its night of toil; but, although weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning. Leang Afah was the first and only convert to cheer the heart of Dr. Milne, and reward the labors of his consecrated life; but to gain that convert he lived and labored not in vain. The young disciple yearned with tender compassion over his native city, as he beheld it wholly given to idolatry, and sought to impart to his ignorant and degraded countrymen the true wisdom which he had received from above. He prepared a Christian treatise, entitled "Counsels for the Age," and, at the risk of liberty and life, he determined, with two companions, to give it wide circulation among the youths who came to Canton in the year 1834, seeking literary honors. Having gratified his heart by the distribution of several thousand copies of his tract, to escape imprisonment and death he was compelled to flee from the city, and seek a refuge at the British settlement of Malacca. But he had deposited in the mind of at least one youthful aspirant the germ of truth, and that principle, subsequently strengthened and enlarged by the culture of a devoted American missionary, the Rev. Mr. Roberts, is at length developed in the doctrines of Hung-Seu-Tseuen, the present chief leader of the Chinese revolution. This statement is made on the express testimony of Dr. Legge, of Hong-Kong, and the concurrent opinion of Rev. Mr. Roberts, of Canton, and all other writers in China who have referred to the subject.

THE POPE'S NUNCIO.

Our readers have no doubt heard and read a great deal about this man, and will probably be interested in the following account of him, and of the reasons for hostility to him:—

There is now in the country an Italian gentleman whose presence has caused an agitation among the German and Italian residents of several cities. He is here as the Pope's Nuncio, to look after certain ecclesiastical questions which exclusively concern the Roman Catholic Church, and also to visit the President by way of repaying the compliment of a most useless mission which the United States have for some years maintained at Rome—chiefly in order to afford a suitable office for young Mr. Cass. This gentleman, Archbishop Bedini, has everywhere been received with hospitable attentions from our best society, and, as far as the educated and wealthy classes go, certainly has nothing to complain of. But, as we said, the Germans and Italians have not regarded his presence with friendly feeling. They esteem him as the deadly foe of democracy in Europe; but, more than this, they accuse him of having participated, morally at least, in some of the worst cruelties that disgraced the suppression of the Roman republic. They say that one Ugo Bassi, a soldier of that republic, who had been a monk, was taken captive at Bologna when Archbishop Bedini was the governor of that place, and that he had the palm of his right hand flayed, and his head scalped, and was then killed, when the Archbishop might and should have prevented such torture. To this the reply is, that these barbarities were committed by the Austrian military authorities, over whom the Papal Governor had no control, and for whose acts he ought not to be held responsible. This explanation does not, however, satisfy the Germans and Italians in question, and they have taken several occasions to express their opinion of the Archbishop by processions, the burning of effigies, and other cognate methods. Appeals to more extreme violence have also been made in some places, but they have had no effect. Nowhere has the Nuncio been in danger; nowhere have the local authorities been unable to afford him all needful protection; nowhere has there been any real riot except at Cincinnati, where the police, led by an over-zealous friend of the party supposed to be in danger, were guilty of a gross, and even a murderous outrage on a procession of Germans, for which the whole corps is now on trial before the courts. And though there have been many unpleasant features in the visit of the Nuncio, there have been other circumstances to balance them; and we have no doubt that, on the whole, he has had a very good time in America, nor that he understands perfectly well that the incivilities he has suffered, and which the authorities have everywhere been able to keep within bounds, are the manifestations of foreign residents, and not of native born Americans.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW.

That portion of the Message of the Governor of New York which related to Temperance, was referred to a Select Committee of the Assembly. A majority of the Committee have promply reported a Prohibitory Liquor Bill—the first two sections of which we give below:—

SECTION 1. Every person who shall sell or keep for sale, or with intent to sell, either personally or by his partner, clerk, agent or servant, directly or indirectly, under pretense of giving, or any other pretense whatever, intoxicating liquor of any kind or name, except as hereinafter provided, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit all liquors owned by him, and in addition shall be punished as follows:

For the first offense, by a fine of not less than fifteen dollars, nor more than one hundred.

For the second and every subsequent offense, a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars, nor more than three hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

Upon the conviction of any person authorized to sell as provided by the second section, of any such offense, he shall be punished by a fine of one hundred dollars, and shall forfeit all the liquors owned by him, and shall be forever disqualified from selling liquor within this State, and upon every subsequent conviction he shall be punished as for a third conviction.

Upon every conviction the defendent shall also be required to pay all costs, fees and expenses, including a counsel fee to the complainant to be fixed by the Court, not less than five nor more than ten dollars.

In default of payment of any such fine, costs, fees and expenses, or any part thereof, the defendant shall be committed until the same are paid, not exceeding one day for each dollar of the amount unpaid.

SEC. 2. Every citizen of good moral character, who is an elector of the town or city in which he intends to sell intoxicating liquor, as hereinafter provided, and who is not a peddler nor the keeper of, or interested in any boarding or victualing-house, provision or fruit-store, or any bar-room, confectionery, inn, tavern, or other place of public entertainment, or the keeper of, or interested in any museum, theater, or other place of public amusement, may keep for sale, and may sell pure and unadulterated intoxicating liquor and alcohol, for mechanical, chemical, or medicinal purposes, and pure wine for sacramental use; provided he shall, within one year previous, have filed in the office of the clerk of the town or city in which such liquor is to be sold, a declaration, on oath, or affirmation, taken before said town clerk, or clerk of the city, who is hereby authorized to take such oath or affirmation, setting forth the town or ward in which he intends to sell such liquor, and declaring that he is an elector of such town or ward, and does not use intoxicating liquor as a beverage, and is not, and during the time he shall sell such liquor will not be a peddler, nor the keeper of, nor interested in any inn, tavern, boarding-house, victualing-house, provision-store, fruit-store, bar-room, confectionery, or other place of public entertainment, nor the keeper of, or interested in any theater, museum, or other place of public amusement, and will not violate any of the provisions of this act.

TEMPERANCE IN NEW JERSEY.—A State Temperance Convention was held at Trenton, N. J., on Fifth-day, Jan. 26th. John W. Hazelton presided, several addresses were delivered, and a series of resolutions were adopted, among which were the following:—

That while six sovereign States of our Union have passed prohibitory laws, and New York and Pennsylvania are apparently on the eve of obtaining this great political boon, we trust that New Jersey will not be one whit behind her immediate neighbors.

That we are fully convinced that the people of this State are ready for the adoption of the principle, and that a law based thereon will not only secure the popular vote, but will be duly enforced by our citizens.

That if the Legislature shall give the people a prohibitory law this winter, to be submitted to the people, we will be ready to meet the question at the polls, and will do our utmost, not simply to secure a majority in its favor, but such a majority as will settle the question forever.

That the friends of Temperance be recommended and urged to keep up their organizations where they now exist, and that preparations be made everywhere for a vigorous prosecution of the campaign till victory shall be secured.

TEMPERANCE IN ENGLAND.—The London Daily News comments upon the decline of drunkenness in the higher classes, believing it to be especially true, with regard to this vice, that in changes of society the prevalent vices go out at the lower end:—

"Half a century ago, Mr. Pitt was known to be killing himself with port wine, and nobody spoke or thought of the catastrophe in the way we should now, if such a thing were happening. Ministers and M.P.'s said foolish and mischievous things in public, and were merely declared to be drunk. Gout and other diseases consequent upon excess were so prevalent as to make old people now wonder what has become of them. The spirit-decanters were brought out in the evening in middle-class houses, and the wine-merchant's bill was an annual expense to the shop-keeper which few would think of now. Half a century of improved cultivation of mind, of expanded travel, of multiplied amusements, and, not least, of a partial introduction of lighter wines, has prodigiously elevated the personal morality of the higher and middle classes."

SUNDAY IN THE LEGISLATURE.—An attempt has been made to get an Act of the Legislature of New York in favor of closing the locks of the State Canals on Sunday. Early in the session, petitions to that effect were quite numerous. At length a resolution was brought before the Senate, requiring that the locks be closed from an early hour in the morning till evening of Sunday. After considerable discussion, this resolution was passed, one day last week, by a vote of 15 to 8. The next morning, however, on motion of Senator Dickinson, the question was reconsidered, and the resolution laid on the table; where it will probably lie during the remainder of the session.

AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.—A meeting was held at the Tabernacle in New York, on the evening of Jan. 26th, to consider the subject of securing to American citizens abroad the rights of worship and sepulture. In all Catholic countries, the most absurd jealousies and superstitions on this subject abound, and in many of them no man stands a fair chance of getting under ground after any Christian fashion if he has the misfortune to die in the Protestant faith. It is proposed to have our Government interest itself in the matter, and endeavor to secure for our citizens abroad the same privileges which we award to foreigners.

QUESTIONS FOR CONSIDERATION.—At a meeting in the Broadway Tabernacle, on the 26th January, for advancing the cause of "religious freedom," Mr. Fuller introduced a resolution asking that our Government be called upon "to secure the same rights and privileges to American citizens throughout the United States," which are asked for Americans in foreign countries, "and that it be not a criminal offense for an American of either sex to teach the precepts and practices of Christ in their households—without regard to color, occupation, or family relations." This resolution was received with hisses, and promptly tabled. A correspondent of one of the daily papers, after recapitulating the facts, asks the following questions:—

1. Is it any greater crime for the Duke of Tuscany to imprison the Madiai for proselytizing in Florence, than for the authorities of Norfolk, Va., to imprison Mrs. Douglas for learning "little niggers" to read?

2. Is it any greater crime to flog a woman in Vienna than to commit the same outrage in Washington or New Orleans?

3. Is it any greater crime to flog a woman in Vienna than it is to sell young and beautiful women at public auction for the purpose of prostitution, as is the case in our own country?

RELIGIOUS WORSHIP IN ENGLAND.—A parliamentary volume has just been issued, containing a report and tables concerning religious worship, as exhibited by the census of Great Britain, 1851. The volume has reference to England and Wales. It appears that there are in England and Wales 35 different religious communities or sects; 27 native and indigenous, and 9 foreign. The latter include all the bodies which have assumed any formal organization. There are, it is stated in the report, in addition, many isolated congregations of religious worshipers adopting various appellations, but it does not appear that any one of them is sufficiently numerous and consolidated to be called a "sect." Taking the population of England and Wales at 17,927,609, there were present at the most numerously attended services on Sunday, March 30, 1851, the number of 2,971,258 members of the Church of England, 3,110,782 Protestant Dissenters, 249,389 Roman Catholics, and 24,793 of other bodies. Of all denominations the number returned as present on the Sunday mentioned is 6,356,222.

A JEW'S WILL.—Judah Tours, a wealthy and liberal Jew, died at New Orleans recently. His will was dated the 6th of January, 1854. It appoints four executors, giving $10,000 to three of them, and making the fourth, R. D. Sheppard, residuary legatee. Nearly $450,000 is bequeathed to different public institutions and for charitable purposes, including the following: $80,000 for the establishment of an Alms-House in New Orleans, $5,000 to the Hebrew congregation in Boston, the same amount to each of the Hebrew congregations in Hartford, New Haven, New York, Charleston and Savannah; $5,000 to the Orphan Boys' Asylum at Boston, $5,000 to the Female Asylum at Boston, $10,000 to the Massachusetts Female Hospital, $20,000 to the Jews' Hospital Society at New York, $10,000 to the New York Relief Society for Indigent Jews in Palestine, also $50,000 to the Agent of said Society for Ameliorating the Condition of the Jews in the Holy Land, and securing the enjoyment of their religion; also considerable bequests to other Hebrew Congregations throughout the United States, and several handsome legacies to individuals.

REVIVAL IN WISCONSIN.—A letter from Wyocena, Wisconsin, says that there the whole community has been moved, and more than fifty have come over from the world to the Lord's side. Seventeen new members have just been welcomed to the Congregational church on profession of their faith, and several more will come forward at the next communion-season. The Baptist church in the place has received nearly as many, and some have joined the Methodist church; several heads of families share in the work, and several children give evidence of the new birth. The good work is still in progress, and greater displays of grace are hoped for.

A society has been established for some time in Paris, for the purpose of suppressing unnecessary Sunday trading and labor. The association already numbers more than three thousand subscribers, including many persons of eminence, and also a great number of tradesmen, artificers, &c., who are decided partisans of this movement.

Mr. James Ewing, who represented Glasgow in the First Reformed Parliament, died lately, leaving a number of splendid bequests; one of them for Free Church purposes amounted to £18,000, with £100 a year to the Sustentation Fund.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, JAN 23.

In the SENATE, Mr. Douglas, from the Committee on Territories, reported a substitute for their former Nebraska bill. [The bill heretofore reported laid down the Southern boundary of Nebraska at 36° 30′, which would divide the Cherokee Country, and to avoid this the Committee recommend 37° as the Southern boundary, and that the country be divided into two Territories—one Nebraska and the other Kanzas Territory.] A pension of five years half pay was granted to the widow of Capt. Gunnison, who was killed by the Indians. The Military Academy Appropriation bill was passed. Mr. Cass offered a resolution, which was adopted, asking the President in what capacity M. Bedini, the Pope's Nuncio, came to Washington, and made a speech defending the Nuncio, and wanted Federal protection extended to him. Mr. Fish introduced a bill, which was passed, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to provide suitable buildings for the United States Courts and offices in New York, and making all processes returnable to the old building returnable to such new one as may be provided. After a short Executive Session, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Committee on Territories was requested to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the Oregon Land Law over Utah. The Committee on Agriculture was instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an Agricultural Bureau, to be connected with the Department of the Interior. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, when a short but warm debate arose on the subject of the Erie troubles, which lasted until the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 24.

In the SENATE, after the transaction of considerable routine business, Mr. Douglas moved to take up the Nebraska bill, and after considerable debate the subject was postponed and made the special order for Second-day next. The French Spoliation bill was made the special order for Second-day week. Several private bills were then passed, and the Senate adjourned over until Fifth-day.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Committee on Post-Offices reported a bill to further amend the act to reduce the rates of postage; also, a bill granting the franking privilege to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. The Military Committee reported back the Senate resolution authorizing the President to confer the title of Lieutenant-General by brevet for eminent services, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and Mr. Oliver, of Missouri, proceeded to speak in opposition to tunnage duties for Internal Improvements recommended by the President. The House adjourned to Fifth-day.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 26.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of New York, and of members of the New York Legislature, in favor of a reduction of Ocean Postage; also petitions that Congress grant lands for a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; also, of citizens of New York and Brooklyn in favor of a line of mail steamers between Brooklyn and various ports in Europe. The House bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the United States Army, who were wrecked on the steamship San Francisco, was reported with amendments and passed.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the disposal of the usual routine of business, the bill to confer the title of Lieut. General by brevet on Gen. Scott was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Ethbridge of Tenn., spoke at considerable length in favor of the passage of the bill. The portion of the President's Message relating to the Pacific Railroad was referred to the Select Committee already raised for that subject. The resolution proposing the reference of so much of the message as relates to patents to Committee on Patents being under consideration, Mr. Clingman moved that the committee inquire into the expediency of so amending the patent laws as to prevent the extension of patents beyond 14 years, and the motion was agreed to. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency Bill, when quite a warm debate took place between Mr. Smith, of Virginia, Mr. Cutting, Mr. Ewing, and other members, on the subject of New York politics.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 27.

In the SENATE, a message was received from the President, in answer to the resolution of Mr. Cass calling for the correspondence relative to Bedini's mission to the United States. After the reading of the correspondence, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the private calendar, and then adjourned over until Second-day.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the transaction of some unimportant business, also adjourned over untill Second-day.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California has been received since our last, of which we give a summary.

The most interesting feature is the accounts from the invading party of Lower California, and the rumors of further fillibustering movements in San Francisco. It turns out that Walker's invading party are not captured or cut to pieces, but have sustained themselves in their mud house and repulsed the attacking force. It is also stated, that Watkins' command had joined him, and that their united numbers were sufficient to repel any force that could be brought against the fillibustering crew. The accounts of the arrival of the Anita with Watkins' force are vague and contradictory, and rest apparently upon floating rumors and reports which, in the excitement occasioned by the expedition, are numberless and full of exaggeration. According to advices dated Dec. 16, the invaders were in close quarters in Ensenada, having made a successful resistance to the besieging Mexicans. A skirmish took place on the 16th, between a fighting party of twenty men and a company of Mexicans under the command of Cols. Millendrez and Nigrete, in which the latter were repulsed with considerable loss.

The farmers are sowing a great deal of wheat, particularly in the southern portion of the State, which is now beginning to prosper as a farming country.

A singular mortality is raging among birds and beasts. Many sea gulls, pelicans, chickens, hogs, dogs, and cattle, have been taken sick and have died; the deaths among the sea birds being very numerous.

The export of gold for the year, as manifested in the Custom-House, was $67,873,505. The total product of the mines, during the five years ten months and a half, since the discovery, is estimated at $260,000,000.

The arrivals of passengers by sea during the year, as shown by the Custom-House records, have been 35,185 and the departures, 30,316; the population having thus increased 4,869.

During the year 1,028 vessels, of 555,794 tuns, entered this harbor, and 1,691 vessels, of 635,489 tuns, cleared, being an increase of 22 per cent. on last year. San Francisco claims to be the second commercial city in the Union.

European News.

Of the European news received since our last, we give a brief summary, containing everything important.

France has issued a manifesto in relation to Eastern Affairs, from which it is evident that Napoleon means to stand up to the crisis and make war unless Nicholas will retract, which is not likely.

From Constantinople there is a new illustration of popular feeling in the behavior of the students, who threatened a riot until they were assured that the Sultan would not settle the controversy on any cowardly terms.

A terrific gale was experienced along the coast of England during the three days of the preceding week. Twenty-five coasting vessels were ashore at Sunderland, and many others along the coast.

The severe snow storm that placed Britain in a state of blockade, had been succeeded by a rapid thaw, which had caused some damage on low-lying lands. The particulars of two or three fatal accidents that occurred on the railways during the snow storm are reported in the English papers.

There was a tremendous storm in the German Ocean during the first week of January, by which about sixty vessels were wrecked.

The Queen of Spain gave birth to a daughter at Madrid, Jan. 5.

In China the insurgents have evacuated Amoy, and the Imperialists had a horrible massacre there.

Awful Catastrophe.

On Sabbath (Saturday) afternoon last, about two o'clock, a ball cartridge manufactory in Ravenswood, Long Island, three miles from New York, blew up; the building was utterly annihilated, and sixteen persons—thirteen of whom were children—were instantly killed. The houses for miles around were shaken as if by an earthquake; windows were shivered, fences torn down, trees swept of their limbs, and the ground for a quarter of a mile around covered with human limbs, arms, legs, hands, feet, heads, brains, and entrails.

Mr. Alfred Pearson, who was an eye witness to the occurrence, gives the following account of it:—

About 20 or 30 minutes past 1 o'clock, on Saturday afternoon, I was coming up the river, on the steamboat Ravenswood; the boat was just below Harris's Landing, opposite here, when I observed a dense cloud of black smoke ascending in the atmosphere, and immediately after the boat received a shock so severe that it seemed as if we had come into collision, head on, with another boat; simultaneous with the shock, I heard a tremendous explosion, as if a whole park of artillery had been discharged at one moment.

We made the landing immediately, and in company with Dr. Sanford I came ashore. The landing is about 300 yards distant from this spot; we leaped over the fences and rocks that lay in our way, and came here as fast as we could get along. On leaping a fence about 200 yards from where the manufactory stood, I saw the upper part of the body of a female. Both her legs were blown off from the thighs; one of her arms was torn off at the shoulder, and the other was twisted under her body. She did not bleed; it seemed as if every drop of blood had either been blown from her veins or scorched up by the quick fire. About 40 yards nearer we came to the head of a little boy, his curly brown hair showing in patches from among the burnt blackness of the rest. On a bank near by was the upper part of the body of a young girl. The top of her head from the eyes was blown off, her body was blown away below the chest, and both her arms were gone; yet this mutilated remnant of humanity, still dripping with the warm life's blood, was smiling—actually smiling; what was left of her face was white, as if alive, and it seemed as if she was in the act of laughter at the time her death so suddenly overtook her; the merry laugh still dimpled her cheeks and lurked around her lips, and she was in another world.

The whole of the ground and the branches of the trees for many rods around were strewn with the remains of the dead. People gathered around in great numbers, but all seemed frozen with horror. The cartridges were continually flashing, and everybody was afraid to come near, lest the powder magazine which stands there should explode.

Sitting upright in the ruins, I saw something move, and running down I found a man named John Smith endeavoring to raise himself from the fire that surrounded him. I immediately tore his burning clothes from his person, and shouted for Mr. French and his son, who were both standing on the bank, in a state of stupor, to come and help me take him into the house. They came down, and together with the help of Dr. Sanford took him into the basement of Mr. French's house. Here he was duly attended by the doctors.

I then thought it would be most prudent to go toward the village, and see if I could not pacify the people, who were beginning to flock in here in great numbers. The majority of the parents of these children lived in Astoria, just above here. I went up toward the village, and the mothers, and fathers, and sisters and brothers, were hastening along the road toward the spot, having a presentiment that the explosion was of the cartridge factory. Within twenty minutes a hundred persons were on the ground, weeping and wailing for their lost ones, and eagerly searching among the ruins for some fragments of the dead. I tried to stop the women from coming near, but it was of no use.

When opposite the Ravenswood landing, I met Mrs. Malcolm, a Scotch lady. She knew me, and asked if the factory was blown up. I dared not answer her, but I felt the color leaving my face; she saw it too, and exclaiming, "Oh, my God! and I have two children in it," fell down senseless and motionless as though shot through the heart. I looked after her, and then returned, and assisted to recover the mutilated remains of the dead. A large number of persons were occupied in this service all through the afternoon. So soon as we had found a new fragment, the fathers and mothers would come around and see if they could recognize on it some sign of their missing children. When any portion was recognized as belonging to a relative, it was borne home, by the friends. Mrs. Hand was looking for her boy Matthew, about 15 years old. At length she found a leg, all shattered and scorched, which she recognized as her son's, by the patched boot, and stocking of her knitting. She took it up tenderly, and said, "Oh my poor Matt., is this all that is left of you for me?" And then she gently wrapped it in her apron and shawl, and tenderly bore it to her home.

The N. Y. Tribune, in an article on the cause of the catastrophe, says:—

It appears that the business was carried on in a building 15 feet by 20, and that in it were employed from 15 to 18 persons, who had just returned from dinner at the time of the explosion. The balls which they are in the habit of employing are conical, and have the charge at the flat end. To make them slip easily through the barrel of the rifle they are greased. The grease pot is a deep basin, inserted tightly into a cylinder a foot in diameter and two feet in depth. In this cylinder is kept an alcohol lamp, to heat the grease. The air is supplied to the lamp by numerous pin-holes inside of the cylinder. The only witness who survived momentarily the disaster said in his deposition, taken shortly before his death, that it appeared to him that the lamp burst and ignited the scattered powder, which ran along to some five or ten pounds of powder, and then the whole place blew up as he was running out of the door. The cylinder for the lamp and the basin for grease are like a glue pot, the light being in the under cylinder. The grease basin fits tightly upon the cylinder, and no powder can get in at the top. No matches were kept in the building. Mr. French, the employer, was in the habit of filling the lamp, and lighting it by striking a match on the inside of the cylinder—lighting the lamp, and then putting the match out in the cylinder. The stove was a common small cylinder, set on the board floor. It had been red hot, but was not so on the day in question. The explosion was so terrible that it cut the victims to mince-meat. Fragments of fingers, toes, entrails and bones were cast five hundred yards, along with the cartridges. Fortunately, no one in the houses at a little distance were injured.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.—It is understood that the Senate Committee, having in charge the subject of a railway to the Pacific, have determined to report in favor of three lines—one through Texas to San Diego; another from the Missouri line, near the mouth of the Kansas having its eastern termini at Memphis and St. Louis, and running through Utah to San Francisco; and a third from the west end of Lake Superior, with a terminus also on Lake Michigan, to the mouth of the Columbia, with a fork terminating at Puget's Sound. It will be recommended to give the alternate section of a strip of land eighty miles wide to the contractor, for building the Central and Northern roads, and an equivalent grant in aid of the Southern one; and to give the contract to the person or persons who will complete the work in the shortest time. The work eventually to belong to the States in which it may be situated, they keeping it up, and carrying the mails, troops, and government agents, free for the government.

SUMMARY.

We noticed (says the Cincinnati Times) a company of eleven colored persons pass our office late last evening, and their pecular appearance induced us to make some inquiries in regard to them. They are the property of M. M. and F. T. White, of the firm of White, Wells & Co., wholesale grocers, on Pearl-st. These gentlemen inherited them, with an estate on the eastern coast of North Carolina; and, though they were offered $10,000 in cash for them, they magnanimously determined to give them their liberty. The negroes seemed to be in the most lively spirits, and are on their way to the counties of Rush and Henry, in Indiana, where they will settle as agriculturists.

The house of a man named Parker, in the township of Orion, Oakland County, Mich., was burned to the ground on Sunday night, Jan. 22, while the family were absent at church, and sad to relate four children perished in the flames. The eldest of the children was a boy fourteen years of age, who from the appearance of furniture and other articles which had been brought out of the house, had busied himself in endeavoring to save the household furniture, and then probably returned to save his little brother and sisters, in which effort he failed, and lost his own life.

On Sabbath-day (Saturday,) Jan. 21st, a distressing accident occurred in Rockbridge County, Va. A canal boat belonging to Messrs. Lee & Co., of Richmond, broke loose from the tow line at the mouth of North River. The river being high, she was washed over the dam with seventy-odd persons on board, six of whom were drowned, Five others were left all that night on a rock in the river, and were rescued on Sunday morning, nearly frozen to death. The boat was not injured, and if none had jumped overboard, all on board would have been saved.

Prof. Henry, of Washington, says, that it has been proved that about five tons of coal would evolve as much power during its combustion as would be equal to the continued labor of an able-bodied man for twenty years, at the rate of eight hours per day; or, in other words, to the average power of a man during the active period of his life.

There were two large fires in New York on Sunday morning last, which destroyed property worth $200,000—turned a hundred poor families into the street—and threw a hundred mechanics out of employment. One of the fires was in the vicinity of Center and Pearl-sts.; the other was at the lower end of Pearl-st.

The Petition, asking for such amendments in the Statutes and Constitution of New York as will secure to the women of the State legal equality with the men, and to females equally with the males a Right to Suffrage, will be presented to the Legislature about the middle of February. The Committee appointed at the Convention held at Rochester in December, have invited all fellow-citizens, of either sex, who are in favor of these measures, to assemble in convention at Albany, on Tuesday and Wesnesday, Feb. 14 and 15.

A young Esquimaux, named Kallihirua Kalliessa, has been publicly baptized in the church of St. Martin, Canterbury, England. This young man was brought to England by the expedition sent out in search of Sir John Franklin, in 1848, under the command of Captain Austin and Captain Ommanney, who discovered, in lat. 76 deg., a small tribe of Esquimaux. He has been educated at the expense of the Admiralty.

A Temperance Convention was held at the capital of Indiana on the 12th and 13th of January, which was attended by eleven hundred delegates. It was resolved, among other things, that "no Prohibitory Law will satisfy the Temperance sentiment of this State, which does not contain the principles of seizure, confiscation and destruction of liquors kept for illegal sale."

The Rev. J. L. Wilson, for many years a Missionary on the western coast of Africa, delivered the fifth of the People's course of lectures, in Williamsburg, at Dr. McLane's Church. Subject, "Africa, its principal tribes, and the proof of a high order of intellect among the natives of the African Continent." The lecture was exceedingly interesting, and was listened to by a large audience.

A society has recently been formed in South Carolina for the relief of aged and indigent ministers, in connection with the Synod of that State. It begins its existence with favorable indications of success and future usefulness. Its primary object is to raise an adequate fund, by contributions, donations, and bequests; then to distribute the proceeds to the disabled servants of the church, and their families after their decease.

The Boston Traveler states that after an address by Dr. Pomroy, in the chapel of the Mount Vernon church, in connection with the commencement of the annual effort for Foreign Missions, a subscription was opened, and four thousand and fifty-five dollars were subscribed on the spot; and that this sum, it is believed, will be increased to nearly or quite six thousand dollars.

Mrs. Douglass, a lady of Norfolk, was some time since accused, as our readers may remember, of the crime of teaching "little niggers" to read. This case has been finally adjudged by the court at Norfolk. The teacher was found guilty and sentenced to one month's imprisonment, which sentence was immediately carried into effect, and the lady now lies in jail, expiating her crime.

The Old Colony Memorial (of Plymouth) says—"Dr. James Kendall, of this place, preached to his people last Sabbath from the text—'Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day,' &c. A dispatch dated Wheeling, Va., Wednesday, Jan. 25, 1854, says: A very respectable young woman named Mary Drake attempted to commit suicide to-day by jumping off the suspension bridge into the river, a distance of ninety feet. DIED,

At the residence of her son, (Eld. Simeon Babcock,) in Salem township, Shelby Co, Ohio, January 2, 1854, MARTHA SMALLY, in her ninety-fourth year. She was the daughter of Wm. Davis, of Monmouth Co, N. J., and great grand-daughter of Wm. Davis, of Wales. She embraced religion at the age of sixteen years, and connected herself with the church at Squam. She was afterward married to Thomas Babcock, and in the year 1789 she with a colony of Sabbath-keepers moved to Western Virginia, and located at New Salem. In the year 1806 she removed to Ohio, and joined a little church on Mad River, called the Little Bethel, which in a few years dissolved by emigration. She there lost her husband by death, and was afterward married to John Smally, and removed some distance from Sabbatarian society. After his death, which was about fifteen years ago, she again had the privilege of society, and joined the Northampton Church. She lived a pious, devoted, and self-denying Christian, and in the latter part of her life she often expressed an anxiety to leave the shores of time and go to dwell with Jesus, which was far better. E. F.

In Hounsfield, Jefferson Co., N. Y., January 15th, 1854, of cancer, WAITY BURDICK, wife of Geo. P. Burdick, in the fiftieth year of her age. Sister B. experienced religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Adams. For the last three years she had been a member of the Hounsfield Church. Vital piety and godliness characterized her life. She was faithful to fill her place in the house of God, and especially in prayer and conference meetings. In the death of this sister the church has lost one of its most valuable members, and her husband has lost a faithful companion. Her end was peace, and she left to those who mourn the hope that she now rests from her labors.

In West Union, Steuben Co., N. Y., Oct. 30th, 1853, WELLINGTON KELSEY, aged 25 years. Also, at the same place, on the 16th of January, 1854, ROXA E. KELSEY, aged 15 years. They were members of the same family, and both left with their bereaved friends the comforting evidence that they were prepared to join the society of the good in heaven.

In Wirt, Oct. 9, 1853, GILBERT E. GILLETT, aged 33 years. Bro. Gillett was an esteemed member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Richburg. He has left a wife and two children, and numerous friends, in the church and society, to mourn, but not without hope. He gave evidence that "to live was Christ, and to die was gain."

In Wirt, Nov. 8, 1853, GEORGE MAXSON, aged 74 years, 11 months, and 15 days. Bro. Maxson was one of the early settlers of this town, and enjoyed his health to a good old age, and died in hope through Jesus Christ.

In Wirt, Jan. 20, 1854, AUGUSTUS KENYON, aged 80 years. Bro. Kenyon was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist connection some 60 years, and bore the heat and burden of his day with strength of body and mind. He was at the time of his death a faithful member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Richburg. The meritorious atonement of Christ supported him in sickness and death.

In Albion, Wis., on the 24th of December, 1853, JARIUS MAXSON, son of Daniel and Susan Maxson, in the 21st year of his age. Bro. Maxson embraced religion some seven or eight years ago, during a revival at Alfred, under the preaching of Eld. John Greene, and was baptized by Eld. James H. Cochran and joined the second Seventh-day Baptist Church in that town, of which he remained a worthy member up to his death. He died of lung complaint, from which he was a patient sufferer for twelve or fifteen months. He died as he lived—a bright example of Christian character.

The Residence of Clarkson.

"A Day Spent at Playford Hall," the family residence of the late Thomas Clarkson, is the title of an interesting paper by Mrs. Beecher Stowe, in the "Autographs for Freedom," from which we take the following:—

Playford Hall is considered, I think, the oldest of the fortified houses in England, and is, I am told, the only one that has water in the moat. The water surrounds the place entirely, leaving no access except across the bridge.

After crossing this bridge, you come into a green court-yard, filled with choice plants and flowering shrubs, and carpeted with that thick, soft, velvet-like grass, which is to be found nowhere else in so perfect a state as in England.

The water is fed by a perpetual spring, whose current is so sluggish as scarcely to be perceptible, but which yet has the vitality of a running stream.

It has a dark and glassy stillness of surface, only broken by the forms of the water plants, whose leaves float thickly over it.

The walls of the moat are green with ancient moss, and from the crevices springs an abundant flowering vine, whose delicate leaves and bright yellow flowers in some places entirely [illegible] the stones with their graceful drapery.

The picture I have given you represents only one side of the moat. The other side is grown up with dark and thick shrubbery and ancient trees, rising and embowering the whole place, adding to the retired and singular effect of the whole. The place is a specimen of a type of thing which does not exist in America. It is one of those significant landmarks which unite the present with the past, for which we must return to the country of our origin.

Playford Hall is a thing peculiarly English, and Thomas Clarkson, for whose sake I visited it, was peculiarly an Englishman,—a specimen of the very best kind of English mind and character, as this is of characteristic English architecture. * * * *

The old stone house, the moat, the drawbridge, all spoke of days of violence long gone by, when no man was safe except within fortified walls and every man's house literally had to be his castle.

To me it was interesting as the dwelling of a conqueror, as one who had not wrestled with flesh and blood merely, but with principalities and powers, and the rulers of the darkness of this world, and who had overcome, as his great Master did before him, by faith, and prayer and labor.

We were received with much cordiality by the widow of Clarkson, now in her eighty-fourth year. She has been a woman of great energy and vigor, and an efficient co-laborer in his plans of benevolence.

She is now quite feeble. I was placed under the care of a respectable female servant, who forthwith installed me in a large chamber overlooking the court yard, which had been Clarkson's own room; the room where for years many of his most important labors had been conducted, and from whence his soul had ascended to the reward of the just.

The servant who attended me seemed to be quite a superior woman; like many of the servants in English families. She had grown up in the family, and was identified with it; its ruling aims and purposes had become hers. She had been the personal attendant of Clarkson, and his nurse during his last sickness; she had evidently understood and been interested in his plans, and the veneration with which she therefore spoke of him had the sanction of intelligent appreciation.

A daughter of Clarkson, who was married to a neighboring clergyman, with her husband, was also present on this day.

After dinner we rode out to see the old church, in whose inclosure the remains of Clarkson repose. It was just such a still, quiet, mossy old church as you have read of in story-books, with the grave-yard spread all around it, like a thoughtful mother, who watches the resting of her children.

The grass in the yard was long and green, and the daisy, which in other places lies like a little button on the ground, here had a richer fringe of crimson, and a stalk about six inches high. It is, I well know, the vital influence from the slumbering dust beneath, which gives the richness to this grass and these flowers; but let not that be a painful thought; let it rather cheer us, that beauty should spring from ashes, and life smile brighter from the near presence of death. The grave of Clarkson was near the church, inclosed by a railing and marked by a simple white marble slab; it was carefully tended and planted with flowers. In the church was an old book of records, and among other curious inscriptions was one recording how a pious committee of old Noll's army had been there, knocking off saints' noses, and otherwise purging the church from the relics of idolatry.

Near by the church was the parsonage, the home of my friends, a neat, pleasant, sequestered dwelling, of about the style of a New-England country parsonage.

The effect of the whole together was inexpressibly beautiful to me. For a wonder, it was a pleasant day, and this is a thing always to be thankfully acknowledged in England. The calm stillness of the afternoon, the seclusion of the whole place, the silence only broken by the cawing of the rooks, the ancient church, the mossy graves with their flowers and green grass, the sunshine and the tree shadows, all seemed to mingle together in a kind of hazy dream of peacefulness and rest. How natural it is to say of some place sheltered, simple, cool and retired, here one might find peace, as if peace came from without, and not from within. In the shadiest and stillest places may be the most turbulent hearts, and there are hearts which, through the busiest scenes, carry with them unchanging peace. As we were walking back, we passed many cottages of the poor.

I noticed, with particular pleasure, the invariable flower garden attached to each. Some pansies in one of them attracted my attention by their peculiar beauty, so very large and richly colored. On being introduced to the owner of them, she, with cheerful alacrity, offered me some of the finest. I do not doubt of there being suffering and misery in the agricultural population of England, but still there are multitudes of cottages, which are really very pleasant objects, as were all these. The cottagers had that bright, rosy look of health, which we seldom see in America, and appeared to be both polite and self-respecting.

In the evening we had quite a gathering of friends from the neighborhood—intelligent, sensible, earnest people—who had grown up in the love of the anti-slavery cause as into religion. The subject of the conversation was: "The duty of English people to free themselves from any participation in American slavery, by taking means to encourage the production of free cotton in the British provinces."

It is no more impossible or improbable that something effective may be done in this way, than that the slave-trade should have been abolished. Every great movement seems an impossibility at first. There is no end to the number of things declared and proved impossible, which have been done already, so that this may be something yet.

Mrs. Clarkson had retired from the room early; after a while she sent for me to her sitting-room. The faithful attendant of whom I spoke was with her. She wished to show me some relics of her husband, his watch and seals, some of his papers and manuscripts; among these was the identical prize essay with which he began his career, and a commentary on the Gospels, which he had written with great care, for the use of his grandson. His seal attracted my attention—it was that kneeling figure, of the negro, with clasped hands, which was at first adopted as the badge of the cause, when every means was being made use of to arouse the public mind and bring the subject before the attention. Mr. Wedgewood, the celebrated porcelain manufacturer, designed a cameo in this representation, which was much worn as an ornament by ladies. It was engraved on the seal of the Anti-Slavery Society, and was used by its members in sealing their letters. This of Clarkson's was handsomely engraved on a large, old-fashioned cornelian, and surely if we look with emotion on the sword of a departed hero, which at best we can consider only as a necessary evil, we may look with unmingled pleasure on this memorial of a bloodless victory.

When I retired to my room for the night, I could not but feel that the place was hallowed—unceasing prayer had there been offered for the enslaved and wronged race of Africa by that noble and brotherly heart. I could not but feel that those prayers had had a wider reach than the mere extinction of slavery in one land or country, and that their benign influence would not cease till not a slave was left upon the face of the earth.

Constantinople.

The city occupies a triangular promintory of land between the Bosphorus and its inlet, the Golden Horn. It is about three miles and a half in length, and from one to four miles in breadth, and is enclosed by a triple range of walls twelve or thirteen miles in circumference, and entered by twenty-eight gates. It is built on an undulating declivity rising towards the land side. Externally it has an imposing appearance, with its mosques, cupolas, minarets and cypresses, and its ports crowded with shiping; but internally it mostly consists of a labyrinth of ill-paved, crooked, dirty lanes, and low built, small houses of wood, or rough hewn stone. There is a number of public fountains, which amply supply the city with water. Its population is estimated at 400,000, including Gelata and Para, and it is composed of about 150,000 Greeks and Armenians, 20,000 Europeans, 90,000 Jews, and the remainder Turks and Armenians.

There are between 300 and 400 mosques in the city and suburbs, 40 Mahommedan colleges, 87 hospitals, 29 Christian churches, 180 public baths, and 180 khans or inns, besides numerous bazars, coffee houses and caravanseries. The seraglio is to the east of the city, and comprises an area of about three miles, separately enclosed by walls, and extending down to the sea of Marmora. The Golden Horn is a fine harbor, deep enough to float ships of the largest size; it can receive 1,200 sail of the line, and is always full of mercantile and other vessels. On the north shore of the Golden Horn are the imperial dockyards. There is always a strong garrison of troops in this city, and many new barracks have been built by the late and present Sultan. The commerce of the port is extensive, but not so great as might at first sight be anticipated. The city is the see of the Greek, Armenian, and Catholico Armenian patriarchs.

Flax Culture.

A farmer furnishes the N. Y. Tribune with the following facts relative to the culture of Flax in Rensselaer and Washington Counties, N. Y.:—

The production of this crop requires a larger amount of labor than any other crop raised in this vicinity. It affords so little profit that farmers are averse to raising it on their own account, and therefore rent to others most of the land devoted to this crop. There are thirty or forty flax mills in these counties, the owners of which rent land and raise flax, because they cannot buy it at a fair price in sufficient quantities to keep their machinery in operation. These mills each dress the flax of 75 or 100 acres per annum.

The following is a fair estimate of the expense per acre of growing a crop of flax:

Rent of land at the usual price	$10 00
One bushel of clean seed	1 50
Ploughing and sowing	2 50
Pulling	5 00
Hauling, threshing and rotting	3 00
Dressing at $2 25 per hundred	5 62
Making a total of	$27 62

Incidental expenses, such as marketing, procuring help, &c., would carry it up to nearly $30 per acre. The usual price will average about 9c. a pound for the lint, and about $1 25 per bushel for seed.

Assuming that we get 250 lbs. of lint to the acre, which is a large yield, and 10 bushels of seed, we have a product of $33 75 from each acre of ground sown to flax—leaving a balance of from three to six dollars in favor of the grower.

Those who own mills save expense of dressing, as the tow nearly pays for that. The crop is not a sure one by any means, for frequently either lint or seed, and sometimes both, are almost total failures. Owing to an opinion that it impoverishes the soil, farmers are reluctant to rent their land for a flax crop. The labor performed on flax is very irksome and dirty, and the cost of production here is constantly increasing. Flax is higher now than I ever knew it before, being 12½ cents per pound.

You see that the profits of those engaged are not large, but the business yearly brings at least $150,000 in money among us, and gives employment to many Irishmen.

Dream not, but Work!

Dream not, but work! be bold! be brave!
Let not a coward spirit crave
Escape from tasks allotted!
Thankful for toil and danger be;
Duty's high call will make thee flee
The vicious—the besotted.

Think not thy share of strife too great;
Speed to thy post, erect, elate;
Strength from above is given
To those who combat sin and wrong,
Nor ask how much, nor count how long
They with the foe have striven!

Wage ceaseless war 'gainst lawless might;
Speak out the truth—act out the right—
Shield the defenseless,
Be firm—be strong—improve the time—
Pity the sinner—but for crime,
Crush it relentless!

Strive on, strive on, nor ever deem Thy work complete. Care not to seem
But be, a Christian true.
Think, speak, and act 'gainst mean device;
Wrestle with those who sacrifice
The many to the few.

Forget thyself, but bear in mind
The claims of suffering humankind;
So shall the welcome night,
Unseen, o'ertake thee, and thy soul,
Sinking in slumber at the goal,
Wake in eternal light!

New Inventions.

Within a few weeks past several important inventions have been brought before the public, of which we find the following account, in the N. Y. Tribune:—

Daniel S. Darling, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has invented an improved dust concentrator for railroad cars. This invention consists in arranging a series of deflectors along the sides of the locomotive and entire train, in such a manner that a series of funnel-shaped chambers will be formed, opening into each other, and forming a continuous channel for the dust to be confined in, while the funnel-shaped mouths will create a strong draught of air which will concentrate the dust, and effectually prevent it from escaping until it has passed through to the rear of the train. The deflectors are also made reversible, so that they can be accommodated to a reverse motion of the cars.

R. H. Collyer, of San Francisco, Cal., has invented an improved quartz crusher. In this machine two large cylinders are employed, which are united by connecting rods and partially rotated in curved basins by a rod connected with a rock shaft driven by steam or other power. The cylinders have no fixed axis, but roll back and forth in the basins which contain them, thus by their great weight crushing the broken pieces which are shoveled in by an attendant. A constant stream of water is admitted into the larger basin, flowing from this to the smaller, and thence to a series of amalgators, where the powdered rock with the auriferous particles it contains is passed through vessels of mercury by means of fluted rollers, and the gold is effectually separated.

H. H. Matterson, of Buffalo, N. Y., has invented a new mode of making cordage, that will not stretch or shrink by use or exposure, and that will be impervious to moisture. This is accomplished by forming the core of the rope of strips of whalebone, bamboo, or rattan, covered by a waterproof coating, and the whole surrounded by plaited thread. For some purposes, cordage constructed in this manner would be very superior.

Halvor Halvorson, of Hartford, Conn., has invented another shoe-pegging machine. The boot is placed in a frame or holder, which is moved toward or away from the awls, in accordance with the horizontal curvature of the sole—the mechanism by which this action is accomplished being a guide-bearing point or tracer and a return spring. Similar mechanism is employed for producing the vertical deviation. The boot has also a movement from heel to toe. But in addition to these movements of the boot, the pegs are cut from a slip of wood, the holes are made for the insertion of the peg. The whole arrangement of the mechanism is very ingenious.

W. G. Merrill, of Auburn, N. Y., has invented a machine for turning ovals which is constructed on the principles of the trammel, an implement in common use among mechanics for making ovals. The trammel is merely a plate having two slots in it, crossing each other at right angles, and having a stock with two pins in it fitting in the slots with a pencil attached to its end. By turning the stock the pencil will turn in an oval, as the center of motion in the stock being intermediate between the pins, it will deviate more or less from the point of intersection of the slots according to the motion of the pins in them. This machine is an application of this principle to the turning of oval forms. Upon the upper part of the frame is placed a trammel-plate, having in it two slots crossing each other at right angles. Above this is is a circular way and a stock, having pins attached to it and cutters sliding upon the stock; the action of these pins are actuated by a pulley above the way. The article to be turned is placed beneath the cutters and is worked into an oval of any desired form. It is an ingenious and beautiful machine.

Stranger than Fiction.

Forty-seven years ago, two little colored boys, one six, the other seven years of age, resided with their parents on the banks of the Delaware river, in New Jersey. One Sabbath, these boys wandered off hungry, and almost naked, in search of their parents, who were in attendance at church. On the public road they were met by a man in a gig, who persuaded them to ride with him, promising to take them to their parents, and supply them with food. The stranger hurried away with them, and that night they were put on board a boat, where they were clothed and fed. Within a day or two, they were in a slaveholding State, and there sold for a trifling sum. The eldest, Leven, continued in slavery twenty-four years, when he died, at the age of thirty-one. The youngest, Peter, had five different masters. In 1846, he commenced saving his earnings, and in April, 1850, succeeded in purchasing his freedom for the sum of $500. In the following August, he went to Philadelphia, to commence the singular undertaking of hunting up his relatives. This seemed a foolish project to his friends, especially as he knew only their Christian names, and that forty years before, they lived on the borders of the Delaware. From them he had not heard a word since he was a child of six years. While in Philadelphia, engaged in telling his story to several individuals, a black man, who was accidentally listening, found him to be his oldest brother, whom he had never seen, but had heard his mother speak of.

Peter was too incredulous to believe that he had so soon found a brother, and was afraid of being imposed upon. However, he was induced to go home with him, hoping that something would turn up by which his doubts might be removed. A lady was called in to see him, who was informed that a srtanger had some business with her. "What do you wish?" she asked. "Well," said he, "I am trying to find my relatives." "What were their names?" she inquired. "I only know the Christian names of my parents. My father's name was Leven, and my mother's was Sidney." Soon as these familiar names were mentioned, she screamed, and ran to him, exclaiming, "You are my own brother, and I can see the looks of my mother in your face." He sat trembling with emotion, but still could not believe. He now said, "If I can only see my mother, I shall be satisfied, for there is a mole on the left side of her face, and I am positive that I shall know her."

When he went toward her house, she stood at the door. As soon as he saw her, he observed the mark on her face, but was now afraid of communicating to her, too suddenly, that her boy, who had been mysteriously absent for forty years, had now returned. He had conversed with her for a considerable time, when another sister, who resided in the neighborhood, accidently came in. On seeing the likeness of her mother in his face, she ran to him, claiming him as her brother. The mother was now deeply affected, and went to her room, where she knelt in prayer. As she returned, she mistrustingly asked him, "Who are you?" "My name is Peter," said he. "My father's name was Leven, my mother's was Sidney; my brother's name—who was kidnapped with me—was Leven." He told her all he could remember of his old home, and now, each other's doubts being wholly removed, all was rejoicing, for the long lost son and brother was found. Tears of sorrow and joy were profusely shed, as each told the story of the past. The mother, who is quite aged, is still living in New Jersey, about twenty miles from Philadelphia.

Cobden's Estimate of American Enterprise.

In a recent letter to a Peace Committee in Glasgow, Mr. Cobden says:—

"If the public were fully impressed with the fact, that the more we spend on our own warlike armaments the less there is to divide between capitalists and laborers, the efforts of the peace party to reduce our military establishments would be more highly appreciated. This view of the question is of still greater importance when we regard the progress of the United States—a country which is destined to be our only rival in commerce, manufactures, and shipping, and whose government refuses to become a party to our political and diplomatic system in Europe. It will by-and-by be a very serious question how far we can run a race with that young giant, and carry on our shoulders a Turk, Spaniard, or some others semi-barbarian. I wish that the good people of Glasgow, who were so eager to make a somewhat belligerent demonstration when Lord Palmerston paid you a visit lately, would realize the full effects of American rivalry in the event of our being engaged in a European war. In my opinion, having for twenty years watched the progress of that country very closely, the effect would be to surrender ourselves and our future prospects into the hands of our transatlantic competitors. In fact, England going to war with the Turks ought to be pictorially described as John Bull walking off in a straight-waistcoat to a lunatic asylum, leaving the business of his shop to be carried on by his Brother Jonathan."

Dry Food.

There are numerous disadvantages necessarily attending the feeding of neat stock exclusively on dry food. Horses, oxen—and in short, all domestic animals—fed on cut hay in a dry state, obstinately refuse, after a time, to consume all that is given them. They become fastidious, and consequently less healthy and thrifty in condition than when fed partly on moist or succulent food

The process which experience has demonstrated to be the most judicious and economical, and, at the same time, the best adapted to promote the several objects contemplated by the feeder, is the following:

A trough, or other suitable vessel of sufficient capacity, is to be provided, and into which a sufficiency of cut oat, rye, or wheat straw, stalks or hay, is to be put, to furnish all the animals with a single meal. For every three animals to be fed, add four quarts of meal with just enough water to moisten it, and let it stand for several hours, or if practicable, till incipient fermentation has commenced, and a slight acidity is perceptible. In this state feed it to your animals, and you will find that not a particle will be refused by them, and that they will continue in better condition than when fed exclusively on any other feed. If desirable, the process of preparing the food may be further systematized by having several troughs for mixing the ingredients. This will enable the feeder to prepare food in advance of his wants, and consequently to have a feed always ready at the hour it is wanted. A straw-cutter of the latest and most improved pattern, should be found on every farm. It will enable the husbandman to work up, to good advantage, a large amount of material that would otherwise possess no actual value except for manure. By cutting corn stalks, tops and butts, fine, mixing with them a quantity of roots or apples chopped into small pieces, or rasped with a rasping machine, and scattering over them a very small quantity of meal, of any kind, together with a little salt, a very palatable and nutritious food will be secured, and one on which most animals will winter as well as upon the best English hay.

Pumpkins and squashes, as well as roots and apples, are often prepared and mixed with refuse fodder in this way.

But, as we believe, the true way of preparing feed for farm stock of all kinds is not yet practiced in the country. We believe the time will come when steam may be used, so that after paying the interest of the cost of the fixtures and fuel, a saving of nearly or quite one-fourth of all the hay, roots and grain may be made, and that the farmer may have that surplus over and above what he now has to sell. Who, among our enterprising farmers, will commence the experiment?

Apparatus for Condensing Smoke.—Mr. J. Bloom, a German, now resident in New York, has taken a patent for a new invention for preventing the nuisance of the volumes of smoke, which arise from all chimneys of great manufacturing establishments, particularly in cities. The plan adopted by the inventor is to carry the chimney flue in a circle from a moderate hight above the fire, to the bottom or near the bottom of a cistern of water. Of course there can be no natural draft, and an artificial one is created by exhausting the air from the space over the water in the cistern by a double acting air pump. The smoke is thus completely decomposed, leaving a residium of lamp black in the bottom of the cistern, while the gaseous portion rises to the surface of the water, and escapes into the air free from dust or color. The coarse part of the cinders are arrested in the upright part of the flue by a sieve, and fall back into the fire, and another portion fall in the horizontal part, and the residue being deposited in the water, it follows that a small pipe would answer all the purpose of a large chimney stack.

Colds in Sheep.

These animals are not unfrequently affected with colds and coughs during the winter season, attended with mucous discharges, or a running at the nose.

The best and most effectual remedy with which we are acquainted, are the spines and boughs of the white and yellow pine and hemlock, and common tar. The latter should be rubbed over their noses, which may be easily and effectually accomplished by spreading it on a board, and sprinkling salt over it. The animals will devour the tar with the salt, and not with so much care as to prevent their noses from becoming pretty well smeared with it. Careful attention and liberal keeping will strengthen sheep, and greatly assist them in bearing up against this disease.

After sheep have been kept on dry fodder several weeks, they highly relish green or succulent food. If they are confined to the yard, scatter over it the evergreens mentioned above, and they will be found to leave the best timothy or clover, and feed on the pine and hemlock leaves. Turnips, beets, or carrots, chopt, and fed to sheep, tend to keep them strong and in a healthy condition, and there is nothing lost to the farmer in feeding these and occasionally a few beans or a little corn. They yield more wool, and larger and stronger lambs, under such treatment, and afford more profit than if scantily fed.

Domestic Receipes.

Potato Pie.—Boil until soft as many potatoes as you like; then peel and mash them through a tin sieve. To a quarter of a pound of potatoes, add one quart of milk, three teaspoonsful of melted butter, four beaten eggs, and sugar and nutmeg to the taste. Bake in tins as you would custard or pumpkin.

Buckeye Bread.—Take a pint of new milk, warm from the cow, add a teaspoonful of salt, and stir in fine Indian meal until it becomes a thick batter; add a gill of fresh yeast, and put it in a warm place to rise; when it is very light, stir into the batter three beaten eggs, adding wheat flour until it has become of the consistency of dough; knead it thoroughly, and set it by the fire until it begins to rise; then make it up into small loaves or cakes, cover them with a thick napkin, and let them stand until they rise again; then bake in a quick oven.

Kentucky Corn Cake.—Take a quart of corn meal, put in it a teaspoonful of salt, and water enough to make a stiff dough. Knead it into a cake. Then rake open the ashes on the hottest part of the hearth; put in the cake, and cover it with hot ashes, and then with coals. It will take two hours to bake it; when done wash off the ashes with a wet cloth.

Minot's Pudding.—A baker's loaf sliced, the crust taken off, the slices buttered, laid upon a flat dish, and a custard poured over, as much as the bread will absorb: let it stand half an hour, then fry it.

VARIETY.

In the career of all men there are elevations and depressions—fits of energy and times of carelessness—high aims and humble objects—alternations of triumph and despair. Sometimes we are inclined to smile at the eagerness displayed in the pursuit of a phantom; sometimes we are moved to tears by the cry of agony wrung from a disappointed spirit. Sunshine and Shadow, Calm and Tempest—these follow each other in the life of man as certainly as in external nature; and sometimes, even when the clouds are at the darkest, a gleam comes athwart the mass to light up the glories of the rainbow.

Bellows speaks of the moral influence of luxuries: "If you would give a man of rude manners some refinement, place him where every object he sees checks his boorishness. If he spit upon the floor, put a carpet on it, and he will think twice before he does it. If he whittle his seat, make it of rosewood and satin, and he will cease to do it at all."

"I've a friend who wants to get a divorce," said a gentleman to a legal friend, "how is he to set about it?" "If he is rich, go to Doctors Commons, and, provided he can prove the necessary facts, he may do so for a thousand pounds." "But he is poor, Sir." "In that case," said the lawyer, "he must go to the workhouse, where, without proving any crime against his wife at all, they will divorce them directly."

If you wish to ascertain the temper of a young lady, look at her nails, and the tips of her gloves. If they are jagged and much bitten, you may be sure she is peevish, irritable, quarrelsome, and too ready to show her teeth at the smallest provocation. This is an infallible test that every ill tempered young lady carries at her fingers' ends.

An agent, soliciting subscribers for a book, showed the prospectus to a man, who after after reading—"one dollar in boards, and one dollar and twenty-five cents in sheep"—declined subscribing, as he might not have boards or sheep on hand when called upon for payment.

The past year has been one of unusual calamity on the sea. The New York Times publishes a list of all the vessels lost during the year, as far as known, together with the number of lives lost. The total number of vessels is one hundred and thirty, involving the loss of nineteen hundred and twenty-four lives.

Every animal has its enemies; the land tortoise has two enemies—man and the boa constrictor. Man takes him home and roasts him; and the boa constrictor swallows him whole, shell and all, and consumes him slowly to the interior, as the Court of Chancery does a great estate.

Consolation indiscreetly pressed upon us, when we are suffering under affliction, only serves to increase our pain and render our grief more poignant.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address,

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

From this full investigation of prophetic circumstances, then, we are thus led to the conclusion, that as regards the house of Israel, no change of the Sabbath is designed, and that all the sanctions of God's law remain unimpaired, and that at whatever period any of them individually return to the allegiance which they owe to the Redeemer, by the law of Christ, they still retain the privilege of God's own Sabbath; till, when nationally they shall have been converted, all shall, in the purity of Millennial times, truly "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." And if thus Scripture prophecy testify of God's peculiar people, it might well be asked, whether it can be supposed that believers of Gentile nations, in those times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, shall sabbatically sanctify a different day from that hallowed by those who, with common consent, "shall be named the priests of the Lord," and "the ministry of our God." (Isaiah lxi. 6.) When all things shall be made new, when the curse which sin entailed shall have been taken away, and creation everywhere shall again gleam with its Maker's glory, and when Israel, on each recurring day of Jehovah's rest, shall commemorate his handy work—will it be that those of other nations, to whom also, confessedly, "the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem,"—nations of those who, in faith and love, shall mutually and joyously exclaim, "Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths," (Is. ii. 3,)—will it be that nations as truly the descendants of Adam, to whom first the Sabbath law and the Sabbath blessing were given, and who shall then all perceive themselves to be equally interested in creation's bright display of the glorious attributes of the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall, notwithstanding, wholly disregard Israel's Sabbath services, with all the blessings these are designed to bring, and the lessons they are so fitted to teach? And shall these same nations, in love to Him who shall then "reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients, gloriously," on some one of "the six working days," of which Ezekiel concerning that Millennial period speaks, while Israel's ordinary labors therefore all proceed, weekly, and for reasons other than those which influence the acknowledged "ministers of our God," consecrate a Sabbath of their own, both within and without the land of Immanuel? Could all this, had revelation been even silent on the subject, be readily supposed to have been probably true?

The improbability of such a thing, even as a conjecture, might surely be inferred from the fact, that the Fourth Commandment itself includes "the stranger" within the gates of those whom it addresses, (even if its continued obligation were supposed to be limited to the house of Israel,) as to be also participant, with them, of their Sabbath blessing. The Gentiles in Jerusalem, therefore, and in all the cities of Judah, and throughout the land of Israel, will and must keep Israel's Sabbath.

But we take still broader ground in maintaining this point. The original inhabitants of that land—Gentiles as they were—were themselves under the obligation of the Sabbath law; and their disregard of its authority formed one of the grounds of the divine displeasure, on account of which they were dispossessed. When God, by Moses, warned Israel of the evils of the pollutions practiced by the Egyptians and Canaanites, their profanation or rejection of the Sabbath is included among the heinous sins charged against those Gentile nations. "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, I am the Lord your God. After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do; and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do; neither shall ye walk in their ordinances. Ye shall do my judgments, and keep mine ordinances, to walk therein; I am the Lord your God. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments; which if a man do, he shall live in them; I am the Lord." (Lev. xviii. 1—5.) A particular enumeration of the transgressions of those nations is then given, and it is enjoined, "Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things; for in all these, the nations are defiled which I cast out before you. And the land is defiled; therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you; (for all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;) that the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you. For whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them shall be cut off from among their people. Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs, which were committed before you, and that ye defile not yourselves therein; I am the Lord your God." Ver 24—30.) And, in the ensuing chapters, resuming the same subject, "The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them, Ye shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy. Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father, and keep my Sabbaths; I am the Lord r God." (Lev. xix. 1—3.) And in th ery midst of the enumeration of duties e nced and sins prohibited, which follows two chapters, it is repeated, "Ye shall k my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctu I am the Lord," (ver. 30;) while the t of aggravated sins is followed by the in ction, once more repeated, "Ye shall erefore keep all my statutes, and all my gments, and do them; that the land whit I bring you to dwell therein, spue you n out. And ye shall not walk in the mann of the nations which I cast out before yo for they committed ALL THESE THINGS, an herefore I abhorred them." (Lev. xx. 22, 23 As Israel's enjoined obedience is thus pu contrast with Canaanitish enormities—as e fact that the Canaanites were "abhorre because they "committed all these thing and that the Israelites are called to "kee all" God's statutes, and "not walk in the nners of the nations" which were cast out efore them, lest the land should spue them o likewise—we are taught plainly, not only hat the Canaanites previous to Israel's ti e had had the Sabbath made known to hem, and that it was obligatory upon the but also that it was profaned by them, an that that profanation formed one of the reas s why they were divinely "abhorred," d why their land did so spue them out, ev n as Israel were warned of the same fate i they also kept not God's Sabbaths. Whe therefore, such Gentile nations shall be bought into a state upon which God's approval rests, and the expression of His favor is given, we might surely expect that they will then honor Him by the true and faithful observance of His holy Sabbath.

The improbability that when, in Millennial times, Israel shall duly observe God's appointed Sabbath, Gentile nations will do otherwise, is farther increased by a consideration of the fact, that when "the Lord will have mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land," we are informed that "strangers shall be joined with them, and they shall cleave to the house of Jacob." (Is. xiv. 1) And so, in the future division of the Holy Land, it is ordained to Israel, "Ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you; and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel." (Ezek. xlvii. 22.)

Even Gentiles not resident in the land shall unite in the solemn services of Israel, in God's Temple, in the rebuilt city of Jerusalem; and of such it is foretold, that "it shall yet come to pass, that there shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities; and the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of hosts; I will go also. Yea, many people and strong nations shall come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the Lord." (Zech. viii. 20—22.) Even the Feast of Tabernacles shall be participated of by Gentile worshipers; for "it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. And it shall be that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain. And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, (that have no rain,) there shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen [Gentiles] that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. This shall be the punishment of Egypt, and the punishment of all nations that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD; and the pots in the Lord's House shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts; and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and seethe therein; and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." (Zech. xiv. 16—21.) Judgments are therefore denounced against Gentiles refusing or neglecting in those days to join in the observance of one of Israel's appointed ordinances, and that one that might even be deemed of a nature more peculiar to the house of Israel. In such circumstances, when an appointment instituted at a later period, and given at first more specially to Israel, instead of being abolished or changed, is perpetuated and extended to the nations, it might surely have been deemed remarkable had Scripture given us reason to believe or suppose that while Israel shall continue Millennially to observe the originally appointed Sabbath of the Lord, another day was weekly to be observed instead by Gentile worshipers. [To be continued.

SIZE OF THE ARK.

Infidels have objected to the size of the ark, and have asserted that it is quite absurd to suppose that ever there could be a vessel constructed large enough to hold all the creatures which must have been placed in it, together with sufficient food—it may be, for six or twelve months—water for the fishes, corn for the fourfooted animals, seed for the birds, and so on. Now we will take the dimensions of the ark from the record of Moses, and calculate them on the lowest possible scale. There are two definitions given of a cubit—one, that it is eighteen inches, or a foot and a half; the other, that it is one foot eight inches. We will take it only at the lowest. Moses states that the ark was three hundred cubits long; this would make it four hundred and fifty feet long, or about the length of St. Paul's Cathedral, London. The breadth of it he states to be fifty cubits; we then have it seventy-five feet in breadth. He states it to be thirty cubits high; so that it was forty-five feet in height. In other words, it was as long as St. Paul's Cathedral, nearly as broad, half as high. The tonnage of the ark, according to the calculation of modern carpenters, must have been thirty-two thousand tons. The largest English ship of war, the St. Vincent, for instance, which is of a size altogether unimaginable to those who have never seen it, is two thousand five hundred tons burden; so that the ark must have been equal to seventeen first-rate ships of war, and if armed as such ships are, it would have contained much beyond eighteen thousand men, and provisions for them for eighteen months. Buffon has stated that all the fourfooted animals may be reduced to two hundred and fifty pairs, and the birds to a still smaller number. On calculation, therefore, we shall find that the ark would have held more than five times the necessary number of creatures, and more than five times the required quantity of food to maintain them for twelve months.

THE WILDERNESS OF SINAI.

Prof. T. C. Upham has been writing for some time past a series of beautiful and instructive letters to the Congregationalist, embracing his observations during a late tour in the East. He thus closes a letter to a late number of that paper:—

I wanted repose; and I found it in the desert. I wanted communion with God; and I found it there. I found it in the day, in the vastness of its objects, and its silence. I found it still more in the night, when magnitude enlarges itself, and silence becomes more silent. I found it in the earth beneath, and in the heavens above. Often I watched the stars. Beautiful as the heavenly mansions, they looked out from their blue abodes—clear and lovely—as if they were the eyes of that great Being who fills their urns with light. There was one, with its large angelic eye, that came with peculiar sweetness. It danced upon the mountain tops. It had no audible utterance; but there was a divine language in its smile, which spake of heavenly peace. It was in the desert of Sinai, that I gave it a place in my memory. It was in the vast wilderness, which had inspired the prophetic impulses and the songs of Moses, that I watched the mild splendor of its beams, and endeavored to record the emotions excited by its mysterious but lovely presence.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE WILDERNESS OF SINAI.

I marked the bright, the silver star,
That nightly deck'd our desert way,
As shining from its depths afar,
Its heavenly radiance seem'd to say—
Oh look! From mists and shadows clear,
My cheering light is always here.

I saw thee. And at once I knew,
Star of the desert, in my heart,
That thou didst shine, the emblem true
Of that bright star, whose beams impart,
From night to night, from day to day,
The solace of their inward ray.

There is a beam to light the mind;
There is a star the soul to cheer;
And they, that heavenly light who find,
Shall always see it burning clear;
The same its bright, celestial face,
In every change of time and place.

Star of my heart, that long hast shone,
To cheer the [illegible]
Illumin'd from the heavenly throne,
Thou hast a ray that cannot die.
'Tis God that lights thee. And with Him
No sky is dark; no star is dim.

WANT OF MINISTERS.

Whatever may be said to the contrary, it is undoubtedly true, that the number of ministers of the right stamp to meet the necessities of growing churches and important openings, has not kept pace with other things, and is now felt as a serious deficiency. On this point, brethren far and near bear the same testimony. From our own field of observation we could add confirmation to what we copy below from the New York Recorder, were it needful. That paper, in an article on the Necessities of Ministerial Education, says:—

It is time that an alarm was sounded on this subject. To our certain knowledge, the formation of new churches is postponed, and the existence of some churches, recently formed under happy auspices, is threatened, for the want of ministers, who, with the necessary qualifications, cannot be found without robbing other churches. Several old and important churches are suffering from the same cause. There are country churches as well as city churches which are in this condition. We may mention, as an instance, that we know a country church in the State of New York, having a good house of worship, and a good parsonage, all paid for—able and willing to pay a salary which, considering the difference in the expenses of living, is equal to the average of the salaries of Baptist pastors in this city, and who ask no more in regard to the qualifications of a minister than that he should be a pious, judicious and earnest man of respectable attainments in scholarship, and who have looked for months, and even years, without success. We know the place and the people, and believe the field such an one as ought to invite the labors of a true-hearted minister of Christ, and yet, without robbing some other church, and so making no gain to the cause, we know not where they can look for a minister. It is within our knowledge, likewise, that churches on home mission fields are calling for ministers who cannot be found, and the difficulty of obtaining foreign missionaries in numbers equal to the demand, is universally understood and lamented. True, there are men who are leaving the ministry, some from inadaptation, some from inadequate support of their families, and some for collateral and indispensable posts, which nobody, having the requisite qualifications, but ministers will take; but no matter what the cause, the fact exists, that there is a sad want of ministerial service, and one which threatens portentous consequences. [Watch. & Reflec.

The whole channel of the Mediterranean must be strewed with human bones. Carthagenians, Syrians, Sidonians, Egyptians, Persians, Greeks and Romans, there they lie, side by side, beneath the eternal waters; and the modern ship that fetches freight from Alexandria, sails in its whole course over buried nations.

EARLY RISING AND PRAYER.

When first thy eyes unveil, give thy soul leave
To do the like; our bodies but forerun
The spirit's duty; true hearts spread and heave
Unto their God, as flowers do to the sun;
Give him thy first thoughts then; so shalt thou keep Him company all day, and in him sleep.

Yet never sleep the sun up; prayer should
Dawn with the day; there are set awful hours
Twixt Heaven and us; the manna was not good
After sun-rising, for day sullies flowers;
Rise to prevent the sun; sleep doth sins glut,
And heaven's gate opens when the world's is shut.

Walk with thy fellow-creatures; note the hush
And whisperings amongst them. Not a sprig
Or leaf but hath his morning hymn; each bush
And oak doth know I AM; Canst thou not sing?
Oh, leave thy cares and follies! go this way,
And thou art sure to prosper all the day.

Serve God before the world! let him not go
Until thou hast a blessing; then resign
The whole unto him, and remember who
Prevailed by wrestling ere the sun did shine;
Pour oil upon the stones, weep for thy sin,
Then journey on, and have an eye to heaven.

Mornings are mysteries; the first world's youth,
Man's resurrection, and the future's bud,
Shroud in their births; the crown of life, light, truth,
Is styled their star; the stone and hidden food,
These blessings wait upon them, one of which Should move; they make us holy, happy, rich.

When the world's up, and every swarm abroad,
Keep well thy temper, mix not with each clay;
Dispatch necessities; life hath a load
Which must be carried on, and safely may;
Yet keep those cares without thee; let the heart
Be God's alone, and choose the better part.

CONDITION OF THE JEWS IN ITALY.

If the reader will accompany me into the Ghetto of Ancona, (says a late traveler in Italy,) and take a glance at the condition of the inhabitants, he will find great cause for surprise at discovering, in the middle of the nineteenth century, so many remains of the oppression and tyranny under which the Hebrew race once universally groaned. The Jewish community in Ancona comprehends upwards of 3000 persons—a large proportion where the entire population does not exceed 30,000—and these are by law restricted to a small and densely crowded part of the town, in which the streets are so narrow that two people cannot literally walk abreast; and the marvel is how the process of construction could ever have been carried on, or such massive buildings erected, in such extraordinary proximity. The want of cleanliness, of light, of air, in this miserable region, is indescribable; yet great as are these evils, they seem mere trifles in comparison to the contempt and vexatious enactments and privations by which its occupants are perpetually harassed. They cannot carry out their dead for interment in the wild desolate burying ground beyond the gates by day, as they would be inevitably exposed to the taunts and hisses of the populace, who have been known to throw stones at the coffin as it passed. It is under favor of the dusk alone that the Hebrews venture forth to consign their departed brethren to the grave. Their lives are embittered by continual fear and dis[illegible] Christian who approaches them—fanatical individuals having [illegible] known to sprinkle a little water and pronounce the formula of baptism upon any Jewish children they came in contact with, and then revealing the act to their confessors, to have given a right to the ecclesiastical authorities to wrest them from their parents, as converts to the church! This is no exaggeration: any impartial Italian can furnish out of his own recollections many instances confirmatory of what I have said, and that bear a striking similarity to one I shall briefly relate, out of numerous others with which the gloomy annals of the Ghetto abound.

Not very many years ago, a Jewish merchant and his wife, being childless, had adopted a niece, who grew up beautiful, affectionate, and the delight of their old age. Like many other children of the community, she had been sent in her infancy to be nursed by a peasant woman in the country, whose extreme poverty alone induced her to stoop to what is considered the degradation of rearing a Jewish child. This woman dying when the girl was about eighteen, divulged to the priest who attended her deathbed, that she had baptized her nursling, then an infant of only a few months old, but had ever since kept the secret shut up in her own heart, where it gnawed and preyed upon her. The confessor applauded her for her zeal, declaring that by her instrumentality a soul had been rescued from perdition; and scarcely had she breathed her last, when he hastened to the Inquisition in Ancona, and announced the discovery he had made. Without a moment's delay, a body of Dominican monks, the implacable enemies of the Jews, accompanied by the requisite officials of police, repaired to the merchant's house, and peremptorily demanded that his niece, as a Christian convert, baptized in infancy by her nurse, should be given up to them. The most frantic remonstrances proved unavailing; she was torn from her adopted parents, and placed in a convent, as well for the purpose of religious instruction, as to secure her from all intercourse with her family.

Meantime, the poor uncle took the most energetic measures for her liberation, and secretly wrote exhorting her to hold firm, with the promise of ten thousand dollars for her dowry if she succeeded in returning to him. The letter was intercepted and fell into the hands of the priests, who did not, however, bring it forward until their plans were matured. He was kept for some months in suspense, being in total ignorance of his niece's proceedings, and denied all correspondence with her, when it was at length intimated to him, that she had readily imbibed the tenets of her religion, and was happy at her miraculous deliverance, and willing to receive a husband at the hands of her spiritual directors; in furtherance of which desirable end, the sum of money he had proffered in the event of her restoration to him was now claimed as her marriage portion. Inexpressibly mortified and indignant, he yet had no alternative but to submit, and the dowry was made over to the ecclesiastical authorities. From the day on which she had been borne shrieking from their home, the merchant and his wife never again sat eyes on their child; never learned whether old affections yet stirred within her; and never knew whether she ever became really satisfied with her lot. The youth to whom she had been united was an obscure impiegato, in some little town of the interior, where, I believe, she still resides. The aunt, quite heart-broken, quitted the scene of so many agonizing recollections, and removed to Tuscany, where greater religious liberty was at that time enjoyed; while the old man divided his time between his wife in Florence and his business in Ancona, to which he still clung with characteristic eagerness; but the charm of his life was gone, and he moved about his accustomed haunts, a changed and sorrow-stricken man.

JERUSALEM.

BY PROFESSOR UPHAM.

The city of Jerusalem is built upon a hill, or rather a connected range of hills;—the hill of Zion, the hill of Moriah, the hill of Acra. But considered in reference to the lofty eminences around it, it seems to be almost in a valley. So that, in looking upon it, we readily felt the propriety of the expression of the Scriptures: "The mountains are round about Jerusalem." We approached it over one of these surrounding heights, which is almost without trees and without verdure. It is thickly covered with rocks. And the narrow way which winds over it, is exceedingly rough and difficult;—so much so, as to perplex even the careful tread of the camel and the experienced foot of the Syrian horses. As we passed the summit of this difficult height, which we were a long time in reaching, we came in view of the long irregular line of the city walls. We met many poor people, for the most part women, returning to their homes in the neighboring villages. They had a cheerful aspect. It was near night. The shadows were setting in the valley of Jehoshaphat. We entered the city on the western side, over the hill of Zion, and through the Bethlehem gate. This gate opens nearly under the massive tower of David. As I passed beneath its heavy arch, I felt that the desire of a life was accomplished. What a scene! What associations! Other lands have their history, their character, their associations, their greatness. But Palestine, as compared with all others, is emphatically the sacred land;—the dwelling-place of patriarchs, prophets, apostles;—the scene of visits and holy communications between heaven and earth. Every valley is a tomb;—every mountain a monument. Wherever I turn my eyes, the dimness of distant history becomes actual vision. I look from my windows, and my eyes rest upon the hill of Moriah, upon the site of the temple of Solomon, upon the Mount of Olives, and upon the supposed place of the Crucifixion.

O land of men of other days!
Where bards and ancient prophets trod;
The land of rapt Isaiah's lays;
The land of David's psalms of praise;
Land of the men of God.
And if 'tis not enough [illegible]
To be the house of prophets, then,
From all thy hills and rocks proclaim
The higher and more glorious name
Of Him who died for men.

In vain, like birds on ocean's foam,
When tossed amid a troubled sea,
In vain the sad in spirit roam,
In search of resting place or home.
Who turn away from thee.

By thee the seal of doubt is broken,
Which long to human hearts had pressed;
By thee alone the words are spoken,
Which "peace on earth" and love betoken,
And give the weary rest

The clouds of Sinai's mount proclaim
The law that wakes the spirit's fears;
From Calvary's height the message came,
The law of love for that of flame.
Love for the coming years.

Land of the soul! for ever dear;
Wide o'er the world the words impart,
Which turn to hope despairing fear;
Which dry the penitential tear,
And heal the bleeding heart.

MISSIONS AND PREACHING.

The Free-Will Baptists in this country have put their hand to the foreign missionary work to some extent, and their zeal in this cause is on the increase. At a missionary meeting held in connection with their late general anniversaries, some plain exhortation was given on this subject and the subject of ministerial support. Rev. C. Phinney spoke as follows:

I have visited a great many churches, and met with rich men and poor men who have treated me civilly. I have seen evil in the preachers, and have told them of it—that they were too mealy-mouthed! I want them to tell their brethren their duty in the fear of God. I had my books with me to sell. And true as you live, some of them, worth ten thousand dollars, were unable to buy them, while they were very willing to borrow them. I asked them how I should get through—who would pay my fare? [Brethren, if you have any preaching to give away, I will show you poor folks enough to give it to.] Some of them would take my book, and read it, and weep over it, and just as I was going away would say, Well, brother Phinney, I guess I will take your book. These persons have not been brought up right.

Said I to one preacher, Do your brethren do any thing for Foreign Missions? He answered, No. Said I, What in God's name have you been doing? What do they give you for preaching for them? He answered twenty dollars a year. Then, said I, brother, you are wicked in bringing up this people so. When you are gone they will fall in pieces. No man hereafter will do as you do for them. Now I am afraid that some of you here are too mealy mouthed. Tell your people that some of their money must go for Missions. Tell the brethren their duty in the fear of God, and let them support you. How have you lived? I tried to live for two years without doing my duty, and like to have starved to death. I made a bargain with the Lord under the spruce bush. He told me to do my duty, and preach to the brethren to do theirs.

I was once riding with an old deacon, and telling him of an old man who had worked hard all his days for nothing and found himself—and he—the deacon—was a dear old creature, his locks floating in the breeze. Now, said I, he is going away to preach, leaving his wife and children behind, and you are saying that he ought to have nothing for it. This does not look just right. He set himself up straight on his horse and said, Brother Phinney, when you come to my house, do you go to the stable, and put your horse up and give him the best hay there is in the barn, and you shall have the best bed in my house. He looked straighter and straighter. [Humor.] Said I, thank you, deacon, my good wife and children at home, do not they need good things as well as my good horse? The deacon dropped his head, and I guess we rode a mile before he raised it again.

This is the way now, brethren. Tell the people their duty. The minister ought to be supported. You will run down altogether unless there is something more done. We are no more covetous than other folks. But we have not been brought up to give. There was a Methodist brother preached in our village in Maine. I found he had nothing to eat but potatoes. I went about among the young men and said, Now that is very wrong. This is a faithful and good man. There must be a collection for him. He must not live on potatoes! Finally, they had a collection for him. I gave my little grand-children fourpence a piece, and said I, go and stir up the neighborhood. Have you paid for your preaching, wife? She said, no. Said I, it is a shame. And so she paid. Brethren, bring up your children to pay the preacher and support foreign missions, and God will bless you.

FRUIT-TREES IN THE HIGHWAY.

If there were no graceless hands, and no heedless cattle, why should not a fruit-tree grow as well in the highway as in a garden or orchard? We ask this question, specially, for the benefit of those Christians who do not see any particular reason for joining a church, and who think it, on some accounts, better to be Christians outside of the church. Now, a garden may be a poor garden, and an orchard may be a poor orchard, but they have at least the merit of giving their trees some chance. But a fruit-tree on the highway is the resort of cattle, for its shade, to be sure, but who repay for their shelter by eating every bough within their reach, while the boys club off every apple that hangs higher than long-necked cattle can reach. Thus, the roots are stamped and packed in the soil, the trunk is bruised and rubbed, and the branches are ragged and fruitless. A church may be careless and cold, and neglect to cultivate its fruit-trees as it should, but it gives them, at least, a fence to keep the cattle off.

However, we see no reason, if our orchard is planted near the road, why some of the branches should not hang over the road, and drop down a part of their golden globes to refresh the chance passenger in the dusty highway. [H. W. Beecher.

GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY AND PREACHING.

We are permitted by the author of the article in a late number of the Bibliotheca Sacra, entitled "the certainty of success in preaching," to publish the following interesting extract from a letter received by him, suggested by the article alluded to.

Four winters ago, a protracted meeting was held in W. E., in which I was invited to preach. As the congregation was assembling one evening, a member of the church, whose zeal had been aroused by the occasion, went into the house and took a seat beside an unconverted man named R. Seeing his opportunity, he availed himself of the few moments before the services began, and turned to his impenitent friend and spoke to him of the neglected interests of his soul. R., being perhaps somewhat ill at ease before, was vexed at this appeal, and testily replied, "That is my own business." This answer cut off all farther words. And besides, the preacher the next moment came in and commenced the exercises. The hymn before sermon being concluded, he arose and announced his text—"If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." His first remark was in these words, "There are some, but not many, who, when privately addressed on the subject of religion, make reply that 'this is our own business.' And in one respect—though in one very different from what they intend—they speak a most important truth. Had a thunderbolt struck the house, our unconverted friend would not have been more startled; and the effect on his Christian monitor was equally great. The latter, at the close of the service, came running to the preacher to tell what had taken place in private, and he observed that his friend could never be convinced but that there was some collusion between him and the preacher, had he not seen that this was plainly impossible. R. was found on the next day among the inquirers; and he has now for years been a consistent member of the church. The coincidence this story affords, I cannot but refer to the sovereignty of God. It would be profane to refer it to chance. [Congregationalist.

A PRIEST CONFOUNDED.—Rev. Dr. Murray, in his speech at the annual meeting of the New York Bible Society, in illustration of the antagonism between the Bible and Popery, related the following anecdote:—

A little girl in Ireland had been to the free school, and had learned to read the Testament. The priest met her, and, entering into conversation with her, inquired, among other things, whether she prayed to the Virgin, to which she replied in the negative.

"Why," said the priest, "do you not pray to the blessed Virgin?"

The little girl pulled out her Testament, and turning to the account of Jesus tarrying behind on the occasion of the visit to the temple, together with the anxiety of the mother, who thought he was in the crowd, "Now," said she, "if Mary did not know where Jesus was, I am sure that she could not hear me if I should pray to her."

THE PASTORAL OFFICE.

There is in some quarters a growing disposition to undervalue the pastoral office. Perhaps this is not to be wondered at, pastors themselves having lowered the office, in the estimation of the people, by their unfaithfulness. But with whatever justice the contempt of community falls upon unfaithful pastors, there is no good reason why the office itself should be held in dispute. If the office is divinely authorized, it should receive honor from God's people, and their prayers and labors should aim at having it filled with worthy incumbents. But is the office divinely authorized?

Pastor, elder, bishop, and overseer, are terms of frequent occurrence in the Acts of Apostles and epistolary writings of the New Testament, but they all designate one and the same office. This has been abundantly proved by those who have investigated the subject, and any of our readers may easily satisfy themselves that it is so. The fact that the terms are employed in the New Testament, proves that the office is divinely authorized, but it does not hence follow that the modern notion of its duties and responsibilities is correct.

The modern notion is this:—that one man, who possesses the requisite gifts, and has been called by God to the work, shall be invested with the spiritual oversight of the church, taking the lead of its meetings, preaching one or more sermons on the Sabbath, and at such other times as shall be thought advisable, visiting the sick and afflicted of the congregation, laboring for the conversion of sinners, administering Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and attending generally to those things which may be supposed to concern the spiritual interests of his people. He is expected to give himself wholly to this kind of work, not connecting with it any business of a secular nature, and is considered as entitled to remuneration from the people he serves. Is this notion according to Scripture?

That the duties here referred to are in some manner or other to be performed, will not, we suppose, be disputed. The sick must be visited, and the afflicted comforted; the conversion of sinners must be sought, and the ordinances of the church must be administered. Means must be used to promote the spirituality and edification of the whole body, that they may all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Somehow or other, these things must be done, whether the responsibility lie upon any [illegible] called to the work, or upon a greater number. We shall not undertake to say, that these duties devolve so exclusively upon one individual, that the other members of the church lie under no responsibility with regard to them. It is an erroneous idea, that the work of looking after the afflicted and comforting the [illegible] altogether the minister's. If one member of the body suffer, not only the minister, but all the members suffer with it. 1 Cor. 12: 26. It is not merely a pastoral, but a Christian duty to weep with them that weep. Rom. [illegible] 15. And, no doubt, one great design of God in sending sickness and sorrow upon his people is to call into action the sympathies of their fellow Christians. But it would be a notion in the last degree absurd, that the minister's sympathies only are to be developed, while those of the people lie dormant. It is an idea quite as erroneous, that the conversion of sinners is to be sought only by the minister. In some articles that we have written concerning the duty of every Christian to preach the gospel, we have endeavored to set aside this notion. And who will dispute, that it is the duty of believers to exhort one another daily, (Heb. 3: 13,) to seek one another's edification, (Rom. 14: 19, Thess. 5: 11,) and mutually to warn the unruly? 1 Thess. 5: 14. The truth is, they are all to be subject one to another, (2 Pet. 5: 5, Eph. 5: 21,) and by mutual counsels, reproofs and manifestations of love, to build themselves up on their most holy faith.

We say nothing of the administration of church ordinances, though we confess we could never see why Baptism and the Lord's Supper were not as validly administered by a private member deputized for the purpose by a special vote of the church, as by an ordained minister.

But after all, does not the New Testament explicitly sanction the pastoral office? Is it not clear that some one individual, if he possess suitable gifts, may be called to take the general oversight of the whole church, and that in exercising this oversight he fulfills the design of Christ? It is true, some of the primitive churches had a plurality of bishops; as the church at Philippi, and the church at Ephesus. (See Phil. 1: 1, and Acts 20: 17.) The church at Jerusalem seems also to have been thus favored. (Acts 15: 2.) But there is no proof that the primitive churches generally were thus circumstanced. Each of the seven churches in Asia had its "angel," so called in allusion to an officer in the Jewish Synagogue. The term signifies a messenger, and in this connection denotes that the pastor is the messenger of the Lord of hosts, (Mal. 2: 7,) sent to impart knowledge to the people, and to guide them into the way of truth. And reason would suggest that, in order that he may be a safe guide, he must separate himself from other callings, and give himself wholly to the work. The people seek the law of God at his mouth, and should not his lips keep knowledge?

Now it cannot be supposed, that the church would receive all the doctrinal instruction it needs from those discourses which are not the fruit of previous study, but are either wholly unpremeditated, or, at best, conceived amidst the cares of every-day life. Those who desire to go on unto perfection—and all ought to desire it—will crave and need that instruction which is the result of severe study. They will naturally expect the "householder" to bring forth out of his treasury things new, as well as old. They will expect to be fed with strong meat, not always with milk. Hence the necessity that some one among them should give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine; nay, give himself wholly to them, that by shewing himself a skillful workman in dividing the word of truth, and by taking heed both to himself and the doctrine, he may save himself and them that hear him. Our conclusion is, that the pastoral office, in some sense akin to the prevailing notion of its cares and responsibilities, is divinely authorized.

A NEW REMEDY FOR AN OLD DIFFICULTY.

"Hengstenberg on the Lord's Day."

In the January number of the "Bibliotheca Sacra," we find a notice of the pamphlet of Hengstenberg, in which he discusses the Sabbath question. The reviewer has given a brief synopsis of the argument; one or two items of which are worthy of being placed on record, as rare specimens of biblical interpretation. These arguments do not seem altogether satisfactory to the reviewer; and yet he suggests, "It may well prompt us to review, if not to revise, the grounds on which we have been wont to justify our observance of the Sabbath." From such a conclusion, of so high authority, we would be led to suppose that the German divine had discovered some new truth in biblical science, that had heretofore escaped the notice of New England theologians. Should it result in revising the theology of the Edwardsan school of theologians, much of the glory that has clustered around the brow of the late lamented Dr. Edwards, for his zeal in promoting Sunday observance, will pass away. We have no right to suppose, that Dr. Edwards had any doubt of the soundness of his views upon the Sabbath question, nor yet that those of like sentiments with him have held the dogmas of their faith as questionable, and subject to a radical revision. The strength of the argument, by which theologians have sought to sanctify Sunday, and on which its observance as a Sabbath is based, may be determined by the argument which is likely to overthrow it. The following is given as [illegible] of Hengstenberg.—

"He holds the Sabbath to be purely a Mosaic institution. He insists that there is not the slightest evidence of its observance before the time of Moses. The account of the creation bears decidedly an Israelitic stamp. God's labor and rest are made typical of our duty. This is anticipative of the giving of the law. This notice of the Sabbath presupposes the fall and its curse. The conduct of the Israelites in the desert, before the giving of the law, shows that the institution was entirely novel to them. With the giving of the law, obligation to keep the Sabbath commences, for the Sabbath had no existence as an institution before. The decalogue is inseparably connected with the whole Mosaic economy. It stands and falls with the ceremonial law. But its spirit and divine sanction remain under the New Testament. The rest of the Sabbath is not the end of its institution, but a means to that end, and of the greatest importance to the observance of the day, to life in God, and the permanence of the church."

When it is gravely proposed to make the above antinomian basis the occasion of a revision of Christian theology, we respectfully suggest that it be tried by the word of God. To make out this basis, the author has to combine absolute contradictions. In one sentence he seals the doom of the moral law with the ceremonial. In the next, he says "its spirit and its divine sanction remain under the New Testament." Whence, we ask, arises the necessity of destroying an institution whose "spirit and divine sanction remain?" What has been destroyed, while so much remains? If the spirit and divine sanction of the law of the Sabbath remain, it all remains. And the great labor of the great theologian, has its counterpart in the throes of the mountain which brought forth a mouse. It was a useless labor; for, in the death and resurrection of the Sabbath, which he has so wonderfully accomplished, he, unfortunately for his purpose, has found no place for the introduction of the first for the seventh day. This whole basis has its foundation in the necessity of justifying a sentiment which has found its way into the creeds and practices of theologians. That sentiment is the one which teaches that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath. No person ever obtained his conviction of a change of the Sabbath from the word of God. Nor did the no-Sabbath sentiment ever come from that [illegible] Book. Theologians have opened their eyes, and found themselves keeping the first day of the week. They have opened the Bible, and found that declaring, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." And because they were lovers of themselves more than God, they have sought to destroy the authority of the law of the Sabbath, and justify themselves in their practices. It is amusing, while it is an occasion of the deepest sorrow, to see the theories that have been started to evade God's law, and justify the practices of the church. They are of every cast and form possible, and only lack the authority of God to make them good. While we laugh at the sophistical, ludicrous, and contradictory theories held up to us, we most sincerely and prayerfully pity those who make them their guide.

Hengstenberg misconceived altogether the nature and object of the Sabbath, when he said, "The rest of the Sabbath is not the end of its institution, but a means to that end, and of the greatest importance to the observance of the day, to life in God, and the permanence of the church." The very concise, plain language in which the institution is given shows that the object of the Sabbath was and is by its rest to commemorate the creation. This is the reason, and only reason, given for its establishment. Thus the Sabbath, in its weekly recurrence, is a standing rebuke against infidelity in its atheistic form. Hengstenberg and his sympathizers rob themselves of the strongest argument against atheism, when they rob the Sabbath of its original character; and yet, for the support of their practice in desecrating "God's holy day," they readily do it. Were they in the observance of the Bible Sabbath, they could say each week, to all gainsayers, Behold in the Sabbath instituted at creation, and observed by Christians, a constant rebuke of your infidelity.

Another important declaration in the argument of the German divine is, "The transfer of its (the Sabbath's) observance to the first day of the week, rests on the authority of the church, which, however, can absolutely effect no more than create a favorable judgment." Such a declaration, from one so high in the theological world, is indeed refreshing. Ye humble few disciples of Christ who have so oft reiterated the above assertion, take courage. There is now high authority in the church for what you have dared to assert, that the first day of the week has only human authority for its observance.

Well does the reviewer of Hengstenberg ask, "If the law of the Sabbath is perpetual as law, where is the authority for transferring its observance to another day? Can the authority of the church alter such a law of God? No such laws regulating external observance are given to the free church of the New Testament." We italicize the last sentence. It is a precious one. It is most truthful and in place. With Hengstenberg and his reviewers, we have the truths, that the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week rests upon the authority of the church, and that no such authority is vested in the church.

After the trial of all remedies, the old difficulty remains. The church can not dispense with a Sabbath. It is essential to its prosperity. It is a necessary fact of Christianity. And yet one class of theologians would destroy the law of the Sabbath, because it specifies the seventh day and not the first as holy time, and then, to give the church the necessary benefit of a Sabbath, introduce a new day, and make a Sabbath of it. Another denies the authority of the church to make such a change, and insists upon the authority of the Sabbatic law, but robs it of its authority as law by so changing its phraseology as to absolutely destroy its sense. Thus theological speculations destroy the Sabbath, and bring it to life again—change it, and make it the same—deny its authority, and acknowledge its necessity—destroy it absolutely, and acknowledge its spirit and divine sanction. Poor thing! How roughly it is treated, and how kindly caressed—how ruthlessly it is dissected, and kindly nursed. How it is owned and denied—changed, modified, strangled, revised, reviewed and revived, for the sake of giving sanction to the day that man has appointed for it, instead of the one God named, blessed, sanctified, and made perpetual. If theologians would receive the law as God gave it, and use the Sabbath for the purpose for which he appointed it, then would all difficulties and speculation about it cease.

JOHN MITCHEL AND SLAVERY.

The following extract from "The Citizen," John Mitchel's paper, has called forth quite a flood of indignation from the editorial corps and the newspaper correspondents:—

"We deny, (says Mitchel,) that it is a crime or a wrong, or even a peccadillo, to hold slaves, to buy slaves, to sell slaves, to keep slaves to their work by flogging, or other needful correctives. We wish we had a good plantation, well stocked with healthy negroes, in Alabama."

Says H. W. Beecher: "Such sentiments are shameful beyond expression. Mr. Mitchel thinks it perfectly right to convert a man into a beast of burden, and to compel him to his hateful daily tasks by whips and goads."

Joseph Barker says: "My heart abhors the monster, and ejects him. May the curses and reproaches of the oppressed in every nation haunt him, and the righteous indignation of every friend of right and freedom and humanity fall on him, and overwhelm him with eternal infamy."

The Hartford Republican says: "Such sentiments ought to make the devil blush."

Similar expressions relative to Mr. Mitchel's declaration might be found in abundance in the periodicals issued within the last two weeks.

I have been led to ask, why has there been such general indignation expressed? In what differs Mr. Mitchel from the expressed public opinion of the dominant political and ecclesiastical portions of this nation? Mr. M. denies it to be a crime to hold, buy, sell, and flog slaves. Does this nation, either in its political or church relations, admit the holding, buying, selling, or flogging of slaves, to be criminal? Does this nation consider its President and most of its Congressmen as criminals? Does not the church admit men who have committed "the sum of all villanies," as members, without repentance? Both the church and nation do admit those who hold, buy, sell, and flog slaves, to the highest offices in their gift.

I ask, then, why so indignant at Mr. Mitchel's declaration, when the nation and the church hold the same doctrine? Dr. Dewey said "he would send back his own mother or son to slavery, rather than not have the fugitive law enforced." Dr. Gannett would not conceal, harbor, or aid a woman fleeing from oppression, if she owed service. Dr. Sharp fellowshiped a slaveholding minister. Dr. Spring would not dare utter a prayer, if by that prayer all the slaves in the South would be liberated, while the slave law was in force. Dr. Cox says that the idea that slavery per se is a sin, is a fanatical lie—a casuistical absurdity—a gross political blunder. It is the fiend with the face of an angel. There are (he says) no worse enemies of all righteousness, no worse traitors, no worse counsellors, no worse foes to the slave, than the primo ministers of the abolition enterprise, those exalted hypocrites—and in the name of God I denounce the delusion, as contrary to his (God's) word and doctrine and his cause, and comforting mainly to the devil and his angels.

The above will show what are the opinions of a few of the watchmen respecting slavery. Then all the great evangelical (so-called) denominations freely admit slaveholders and their abettors to unrestricted fellowship and communion. It therefore seems to me that the American church and nation do not essentially differ in their views of slavery from Mr. Mitchel. If, then, such indignant scorn was deserved by Mr. Mitchel, what should hinder this nation and the professed church from bearing their part? The American Tract Society, for refusing to bear its testimony against slavery, I put in the same category with Mitchel, as far as this question is concerned. The American Sunday-School Union, I suppose, stands implicated in the same thing. Render to all their dues. If Mitchel deserves denunciation for his views of slavery, so do all those Doctors of Divinity above named; so does the American church; so do American politicians, who, either in theory or practice, coincide with him. The Man of Sin is the same, whether he appears as an editor-fugitive from Australia, a fillibuster in Congress, or a minister at the altars of Christianity. If a man love not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen.

3. The Remittance Committee stated that they had sent to our missionaries in China, by bark Storm, a box containing 700 Mexican dollars, a box and a firkin for Bro. Wardner from friends in Allegany County, and all parcels which had accumulated up to Dec. 10th. Accompanying the box and cask from Allegany Co., $7 was received, of which $6 34 was paid in expenses, and the balance passed to the Treasurer.

4. The following resolution was adopted:—

Resolved, That the Corresponding Secretary be instructed to request all societies and individuals having articles for the use of our missionaries, such as may be needed by them, or to be given by them to the poor, to apprize their value, enclose a bill, and forward to A. D. Titsworth, Treasurer, care of Geo. B. Utter, 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., unless specially directed to do otherwise.

Hull an order on the Board for $20, to be divided equally between the Palestine and China Missions. The order was accepted, and $80 additional was voted to complete the previous appropriation in favor of Bro. Hull for services up to Dec. 31, 1853.

8. The matter of securing passage for the missionaries to Palestine and supplying them with money to [illegible] along, was referred to the Committee on Outfit.

9. It was voted to have printed 1,000 copies of the Annual Report adopted at the Anniversary at Adams Center. A note, having reference to the reasons given in the Report for abandoning the Canada Mission, was adopted and ordered printed with the Report.

10. Voted, to remit to brethren Carpenter and Wardner, our missionaries in China, $750 each per annum.

11. T. B. Brown stated that before the next meeting of the Board he would probably be so located as to render his attendance impossible, and he therefore tendered his resignation of the office of Corresponding Secretary. The resignation was accepted. James Bailey was chosen to fill the vacancy; and David Dunn, J. D Titsworth and James Bailey were appointed a Committee to prepare and present at the next meeting a minute expressive of the Board's regret at losing the services of Bro. Brown in that capacity.

12. James Bailey resigned his office as a Vice President of the Society, and T. B. Brown was chosen to fill the vacancy.

14. Adjourned to meet at New Market, N. J., on the first Fifth-day in April, 185

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Chinese Insurgents—Their Sabbath-keeping.

Glasgow, January 13, 1854.

Another China Mail, with dates from Shanghae of Nov. 19th, has arrived, from which we learn that the Imperialists have retaken Amoy. The insurgents had all left previously; but the Imperialists put 1,000 persons to death in cold blood, in a spirit of revenge, or, as perhaps more correctly supposed, that they might make report of their valor, attested by the number of the slain. In their junks, the insurgent party are stated to have proceeded to Shanghae, which it is deemed of much more importance to maintain. The ex-Toutae had made a great but unsuccessful effort to retake Shanghae, occasioning considerable loss. Notwithstanding, the general movement appears to progress, and it is believed that Pekin is invested by the insurgents, whose successes are still reported in other parts of the country.

The fact of the insurgents observing the seventh day as the Sabbath, is now put on record by the Bishop of Victoria. The London Record has given lengthened extracts from the charge of the Bishop to his clergy, delivered at Shanghae on the 20th October last, and these extracts have been copied by many of our other papers. He takes an extensive view of the Insurrection, its causes and its consequences, entertaining no doubt of its successful issue, and believing, as he does, that general peace will soon follow. In reference to their observance of the Sabbath, he makes the following statement:—"A recent visitor, an American medical missionary, relates of the insurgent forces within the city of Chin-Keung, that among them the Sabbath was kept holy—(although by an astronomical error in their calendar they kept as such the seventh instead of the first day of the week)—public religious services were regularly held—appointed officers, like Cromwell's generals of old, preached to the troops—and the general signs of order, morality, and decorum, prevailed. At each dawn of the day, the rebel garrison assembled for prayer in the various military guard-houses; and there, to the sound of native music, they sang hymns, chants, and doxologies to the Trinity, all kneeling devoutly in prayer to the Almighty." It is satisfactory to have thus the Bishop's unqualified admission of the fact that it is the seventh day that is observed; while no evidence is adduced, nor reason assigned, for the supposition that this is not done in express obedience to the Fourth Commandment. There is abundant evidence of the importance they attach to the whole Ten Commandments, as a rule of life; and it is therefore to be inferred, that they would seek to ascertain which was the seventh day, in order that they might sanctify the day named in the commandment. We can scarcely perceive what sort of "astronomical error of their calendar" could account for their adoption of the right day of the week rather than the wrong day. We are therefore in hope that they have deliberately adopted the right day in true obedience; and therefore, that they will continue to do so as unto the Lord, even if their instructors should strive to make them follow men only. "'Tis time thou work, Lord, for they have made void thy law divine." These men are, moreover, not ignorant of the resurrection of Christ, for in their own writings they distinctly mention it as matter of revelation. Whether they possess supplies of the whole Scriptures, does not appear; but the allusions made lead us to suppose that they do. It is true, that only the first half of Genesis, printed by themselves, has been yet received; but it is expressly marked as "volume the first," which, as the Bishop of Victoria justly remarks, "leads to the supposition that other portions of the Sacred Record have been published, or are in the course of publication."

The Sabbath Recorder long ago, in the correspondence of the Sabbath-keeping Chinese missionary, stated Gutzlaff's acknowledgment that the seventh day had formerly been observed in China; and now the Bishop states, in accordance, so far, with that statement, they believe "that China once acknowledged the God of patriarchal tradition," quoting from their own documents, that "from the time of Pwan-Koo," (the first man of whom the Chinese speak,) "down to the period of the three dynasties, both princes and people honored, and worshiped the Great God." If by "the first man of whom the Chinese speak," we are to understand their traditionary account of the first man as created by the Great God, we know that he, in obedience to the divine command, did observe the seventh day. But it is probable that China, as the Israelites themselves, had a farther promulgation of the Fourth Commandment when the Gospel was proclaimed amongst them in the early ages by Nestorian Christians. How far or how long the influence of Christian Missionaries extended here, we know not; but in a recent review, in the London Athenæum, of Padre Juan Gonzales de Mendoza's History of China, about 1547, it is stated that Carpini, who, together with five other Minorites, was sent by the Pope in 1245, "represents them as more than half Christians." This the review pronounces, "strange enough;" but may not part of the strangeness be owing to our ignorance of the history of the preceding ages?

From recent accounts, we learn that "the rebel chiefs are actively engaged in distributing tracts and copies of the Scriptures. The Rev. George Taylor was now on his third trip to their camp, and the Rev. Mr. Roberts is in company with him, hoping to reach the chief." We may hope, and ought to pray, that should he find that chief, he will not do him evil but good, by teaching him to seek the honor that cometh from God only.

The Bible in Italy.—A correspondent of the London Times, writing recently from Nice, states that he was present when the first attempt to import Bibles into Sardinia was made, after the adoption of the new Constitution. Nobody could be obtained to sell them; and when, at length, an obscure chemist undertook the office, it was nearly at the cost of his life. Since then Protestantism has made rapid strides. The writer, when at Turin, took some pains to ascertain the number of Protestants there, and from the most authentic sources discovered that there were at least 7,000. A spirit of free inquiry and discussion is gaining ground, not so much on political as on religious subjects; even the professed Roman Catholic papers in Turin and elsewhere do not hesitate freely to discuss these matters.

Missionaries Deceased.—Information has reached the Missionary Rooms, in Boston, of the recent decease of three female missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union—Mrs. Rose, wife of the Rev. A. T. Rose, at Akyab, Arracan, Oct. 21; Mrs. Shermer, wife of the Rev. H. B. Shermer, at Bexley, West Africa, Sept. 23; and Mrs. M. B. Crocker, relict of the late Rev. W. G. Crocker, at Monrovia, Nov. 23.

More Street-Preaching.—While Mr. West, a street preacher, was holding forth in an open lot on Fourteenth-st., New York, last Sunday, an attempt was made to create a disturbance. Several of the rioters were arrested, and the meeting proceeded. Remarks against Romanism were the occasion of disturbance.

Reports of our Societies.—The Annual Reports of our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, have been put up in parcels for each church of the denomination, and will be forwarded by the first opportunity. Meanwhile we hope the churches will send for them when they can.

The Payson Congregational Church at East Hampton, Mass., a beautiful structure, and elegantly furnished, was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 29th ult. The fire took in the furnace room, a few minutes before the time of service, 10½ o'clock, and entirely consumed the edifice, together with the fine organ and furniture, with the exception of the settees in the vestry, which were saved. The Church was new, having been dedicated about thirteen months since, and was built at a cost, including fixtures and town clock, of $20,000.

A prohibitory liquor law has been reported in the House of Delegates of Maryland. It is stated that the law does not interfere with the right of individuals to keep the article in their dwellings for their own use, but is intended to prohibit the making of or dealing in it in any way whatever, except for medicinal, mechanical, artistical, and sacramental purposes, and then only through a permit from a Judge of the Court presiding in the district. The fines and penalties for violations of the law are very heavy.

A plan is before the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and will probably pass into a law, for the sale of the Public Works of the State. No bids are to be received less than the following: For the Delaware Division of the Pennsylvania Canal, $2,500,000; for the Main Line from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, $12,000,000; for the Susquehanna and N. Branch Division, $5,000,000; for the West Branch, $500,000; Total, $20,000,000.

Three lucid and instructive Prize Essays on Tobacco, its history, use, nature and effects, have just been issued by Fowler & Wells, as separate Tracts for cheap dissemination. The writers are respectively Drs. R. T. Trall and Joel Shew of New York, and the Rev. Dwight Baldwin of the Sandwich Islands Mission.

In the Senate of Wisconsin, Jan. 23, the bill was reported to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, with an amendment striking out that part providing for a submission of the question to the people, and its passage recommended.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, JAN 30.

In the SENATE, the feature of the day was a speech of Mr. Douglas on the Nebraska bill. He argued that the Missouri Compromise was not only repealed by the Adjustment of 1850, but that the Free-Soilers then in Congress themselves consummated the act. Messrs. Chase and Sumner replied to the speech of Mr. Douglas. Mr. Allen presented the resolutions of the Rhode Island Legislature instructing the Senators from that State to oppose any repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Mr. Brodhead presented twenty seven petitions from Pennsylvania against the removal of the Mint to New York. The bill granting the franking privilege to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey was passed. Mr. Cass offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling for the correspondence of United States Minister Marsh, at Constantinople, relative to the case of the Rev. Dr. King, Missionary. The joint resolution of the House, appointing a Select Committee on the proposed amendments to the Constitution in respect to the manner of electing President, was adopted.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Walker offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on Post-Office to inquire and report on the expediency of causing to be purchased or erected in the City of New York, a building to serve as a Post-Office, and if deemed expedient, to accommodate the United States Courts and their officers. Mr. Davis of Rhode Island presented resolutions of the Legislature of that State, against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Mr. Dean introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, to remove the Mint from Philadelphia to New York.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 31.

In the SENATE, Mr. Foote introduced a bill to incorporate the National Pacific Railroad Company, which was referred to a Select Committee. Mr. Clayton offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling for the correspondence between the State Department and the British Government relative to the Sandwich Islands, and especially certain correspondence in 1843. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the usual opening business, Mr. Richardson, from the Committee on Territories, reported the bill to organize the Nebraska and Kansas Territories, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. A bill was reported authorizing the purchase or construction of four additional revenue-cutters. The Committe on Post-Offices reported a bill to secure the safe transmission of the United States mails on Railroads, in view of the Erie difficulties, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and the House then adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 1.

In the SENATE, a number of petitions were presented, and considerable routine business was transacted. Mr. Sumner presented a petition from Lancaster, Pa., praying that Congress would prevent the introduction of Slavery into territory now free. Mr. Butler reported back the House bill to secure the rights of citizenship to children of United States citizens born out of the limits thereof.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the reading of the journal, Mr. Jones of New York moved a reconsideration of yesterday's vote, by which the bill to prevent obstructions to the mails on railroads was referred to the Committee of the Whole, which caused considerable debate. Pending the reconsideration, the House went into Committee of the Whole, and shortly after adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 2.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented the Resolutions of the Legislature of New York, calling the attention of Congress to the alarming mortality on board of emigrant vessels, and asking appropriate legislation on the subject. The House bill, granting five years' additional time for the location of bounty land warrants issued for service in the war of 1812, was taken up and passed. The Committee on Printing reported adversely to the bill to establish a Government Printing-office. A resolution was adopted calling for the correspondence of the American Minister at Constantinople relative to the Kozta case. The resolution offered by Mr. Clayton, calling for the correspondence, &c., concerning the Sandwich Islands, was adopted.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES spent the whole day on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 3.

In the SENATE, the prominent topic of discussion was the Nebraska question. Mr. Chase having the floor, made a lengthy speech in reply to Mr. Douglas and in opposition to the bill.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Speaker laid before that body a communication from the President, in compliance with the resolution of the 30th ult., for all correspondence between the State Department and the American Chargé d'Affairs at Austria relative to persons claiming the protection of this Government. After the reading of the communication, several documents were laid on the table and ordered to be printed, and the House adjourned until Second-day.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 4.

In the SENATE, a variety of petitions were presented. Mr. Fish presented the proceedings of the meeting at the Tabernacle against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The Clerk read the paper partly through, when Mr. Douglas objected to the reading, and on his motion the reading was discontinued. The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Nebraska bill; Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky, having the floor, advocated the bill in a short speech.

ONE OF THE HAIL STORMS.—Up in Goodhope, Fayette County, Ohio, according to a note in the Statesman, they had a hail storm on the late memorable "storm-Friday," that may rank with the number ones. The writer says:

"It was preceded by the most violent thundering for the space of one hour. The hail commenced falling about the size of quails' eggs. In a short time they reached the size of walnuts, and continued to increase in size and quantity until they were the size of a goose egg! The largest hail stones were not round, but partially flattened, with a great quantity of prominences. The roofs of houses were staved in, window glass broken, chickens, birds and turkeys killed, and a great many men crippled. We have had hail on the ground in some places four inches deep!"

European News.

We have several days later news from Europe, the most striking feature of which is the report of a Russian defeat at Tshetal, near Kalefat, on the Danube. According to this report, Omer Pasha, with 15,000 men, stormed and took a Russian entrenchment occupied by 20,000, and also repulsed a body of 10,000 marching to reinforce the army routed by his first attack. The report is received both by way of Constantinople and Vienna, and must therefore be substantially true, though possibly exaggerated.

Since the foregoing was in type, we have later accounts of the battle of Tshetal confirming the Turkish successes. It appears that the Russians were concentrating a force at Tshetal in order to attack Kalefat on the 13th, but on the 6th, 15,000 Turks marched out of Kalefat, attacked and stormed Tshetal, had a conflict with the Russians in the field on the 7th, and renewed the battle on the 8th, ending in the evening with the total discomfiture of the Russians, who confess to 4,000 killed, and their generals, Aurep and Tuinout, wounded. On the 9th the Turks, having remained over night on the field beyond Tshetal, attacked the reserve of the Russians, and drove them back upon Krajova, with the loss of cannon and immense slaughter on both sides. On the 10th the Turks, having razed the Russian fortifications, returned to Kalefat.

The greatest activity prevails in the French navy yards. The operatives are ordered to work on Sundays, and every ship is to be fitted for sea immediately. A levy had also been made of all the seamen between twenty and forty years old, and all the Newfoundland fishermen are drafted into the fleet. Stores for forty thousand soldiers are ready for shipment at Toulon.

The Roman States are suffering greatly from scarcity of food, especially at Fenezza and Ravenna. A scarcity also prevails at Naples.

From China, the political news is quite interesting. At Canton all is quiet. At Shanghai the belligerents keep up a desultory warfare, with little or no results. From Amoy the most melancholy accounts have been received, involving an amount of bloodshed that is calculated to strike terror into the hardest heart, and with any other people than Chinese, would induce a reäction and a cry of vengeance on the authors of such fearful outrages as those now enacting at Amoy and in its neighborhood. The Imperialists have retaken the place, and have marked their success by slaying in cold blood nearly 1,000 persons, most of whom took no part in the late movement except on compulsion. The streets and wharves of Amoy have literally streamed with blood, not shed in any warlike operations, but done in savage revenge and to blind the authorities at Pekin as to the bravery of the enactors. A letter from Amoy, dated November 22, states that up to that period all was quiet, and matters wore much the same appearance, as far as foreigners were concerned, as under the insurgent rulers. Executions were of daily occurrence. The Mandarins, to mark their success, were reveling in human gore, putting to death all who fall into their hands indiscriminately. The original mover of the rebellion had been given up to the Mandarins; the unfortunate wretch was executed on the 17th November, together with his son, both bodies being quartered and their heads placed on the principal city gates. The villages around Amoy were made to contribute to the monster executions. Whole villages were threatened with death unless they gave up all who took part in or sympathized with the rebels; and as a consequence of this brutal demand, the poor, weak, inoffensive and defenseless villagers, were surrendered up as victims to satiate the Mandarins' thirst for blood.

A Slave Burned to Death.

A mob was collected together and a Lynch Court was held to determine what was best to be done with a negro who had the impudence to raise his hand against a white man. The Lynch Court decided that he should be burned at the stake. A Natchez paper, the Free Trader, giving an account of it, says the negro was taken and chained to a tree immediately on the bank of the Mississippi, on what is called Union Point. Faggots were then collected and piled round him, to which he appeared quite indifferent. When the work was completed, he was asked what he had to say. He then warned all to take example by him, and asked the prayers of all around. He then called for a drink of water, which was handed him; he drank it and said: "Now set fire, I am ready to go in peace." The torches were lighted and placed in the pile, which was soon ignited. He watched unmoved the curling flame, that grew until it began to entwine itself around and fix upon his body, and then he sent forth cries of agony, painful to the ear, begging some one to blow his brains out, at the same time struggling with almost superhuman strength, until the staple with which the chain was fastened to the tree (not being well secured) drew out, and he leaped from the burning pile. At that moment, the sharp ringing of several rifles was heard, and the body of the negro fell a corpse on the ground. He was picked up by some two or three, and again thrown into the fire and consumed, not a vestige remaining to show that such a being ever existed. Nearly four thousand slaves were collected from the plantations in the neighborhood to witness this scene. Numerous speeches were made by the magistrates and ministers of religion, to the large concourse of slaves, warning them, and telling them that the same fate awaited them if they should prove rebellions to their owners.

EMANCIPATED SLAVES.—On the first day of February, thirty-four negroes, emancipated by the will of William M. Colgin, of Taylor County, Ky., who died about sixteen months since, passed through Cincinnati, on their way to Shelby County, Ohio, where the executors of Mr. Colgin have purchased a home for them. By the will of their master they were given $4,000 in money, and horses, wagons, farming utensils, &c., sufficient to give them a fair start. Samuel Simpson, one of the executors, went to Sidney by railroad to make arrangements for their comfortable settlement; the other, J. G. Simpson, accompanied them on the way. They travel in their own wagons. As they passed through the city their appearance attracted a great deal of attention.

THE RAVENSWOOD CATASTROPHE.—The Coroner's Jury in the case of the explosion of French's cartridge factory at Ravenswood, find "that the deceased came to their death, between the hours of 1 and 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 28th day of January, by the explosion of gunpowder, in the building used for the manufacture of gun-cartridges by Erasmus French, situated near Harris's Foundery in Ravenswood, Queens Co., L. I., and that the persons named were at that time actually employed in the manufacture of gun-cartridges in said building. We further find, that before and at the time of such explosion a lamp fed by alcohol was used for heating grease necessary for making the cartridges; that there were between 400 and 500 pounds of gunpowder in said building, and that the explosion was caused by carelessness and negligence in the use of said lamp. We further find, that there were at the time of said explosion fifteen to twenty persons at work in said building, most of whom were children; that the building was only 15 by 25 feet, and much too small for carrying on with safety the business for which it was used; that the arrangements for heating the building were very defective, there being a stove used for that purpose, without any fender or zinc, that the proprietor, Erasmus French, was absent from the building at the time of the explosion, and that the person in charge was a female of not sufficient age or experience properly to superintend the work, or the persons employed."

The Coroner required Mr. French to give bail in the sum of $2,000 to appear before the Grand Jury of Queen's County on the first Monday in March.

SUMMARY.

The Louisville Courier gives a list of the disasters which occurred on the Western Waters during the year 1853. It seems that seventy-five steamboats, four barges, and forty-four flat-boats, were destroyed, and that eighty-six persons were killed, being either blown up, burnt, or drowned. The amount of money lost by these disasters is not stated, but it is supposed to be about $1,107,500 for the steamboats and their cargoes, and $60,000 for the flat-boats and cargoes, making a sum total of $1,167,500. During the month of November, not less than twenty flat-boats of coal were sunk in the Ohio and Mississippi rivers by snags or otherwise.

On the 30th of January, John Marshall Parker was accidentally shot, near Brookville, Ind. He was the oldest son of the Hon. S. W. Parker, member of Congress from the Connersville, Ind., District. He went on that day, to the pigeon-roost, in company with several citizens of Connersville. When they arrived near the ground, he went to the carriage to get his gun. He took hold of the muzzle and pulled it toward him, when the gun went off, shooting him in the heart, and he expired in five minutes, without uttering a word. He was a young man about 19 years of age, and of superior order of talents and correct moral habits.

There is a project before Congress to supply the Cities of Washington and Georgetown with water, known as the Washington Aqueduct or Water-Works project. The plan is to take the water from the Falls of the Potomac and bring it by a brick conduit fourteen miles long and nine feet in diameter to the Capitol in Washington, supplying Georgetown by the way. The estimated cost is six or seven millions of dollars. But every one who knows anything of the way estimates are made in anticipation of appropriations asked from Congress, knows that they rarely exceed one-third or one-half of the ultimate cost.

The project for changing the rates of postage under this Government, reported by Mr. Olds a few days since from the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, contemplates making it obligatory to pre-pay all letters sent in the mails, and proposes also to fix the rates of postage at three cents per half ounce for all distances up to three thousand miles, and six cents for all greater distances. We learn, on inquiry, that about 900 bushels of dead letters are received at the Post-Office Department each quarter, three fourths of which are of course unpaid.

Sixth-day, Feb. 3, was a gala day in Easton, Pa.—the occasion being the opening of the Belvidere Delaware Railroad, which has just been completed from Trenton, N. J., to Easton, Pa., a distance of fifty miles. At Trenton this road intersects the Camden and Amboy, making the distance from Easton to Philadelphia about 80 miles. It is about the same distance from Easton to New York by the Central road to Elizabethtown and New Jersey road thence to New York.

C. H. Ellis, who formerly carried the mail from Cazenovia to De Ruyter, and recently mail contractor from De Ruyter to New Berlin, has been arrested for robbing the mail while in his charge of a draft for $70, and by forging a letter getting its contents. He has been held to bail. Years since, when Mr. Ellis carried the mail south, numerous sums of money were lost between Cazenovia and De Ruyter, and all attempts to detect the thief were in vain.

From the late Report made to Congress by the Surgeon-General of the United States Army, it appears that the adulteration of drugs and medicines is carried on more extensively in the country since the passsge of the Act of Congress to suppress the importation of such articles, so that it is now alleged to be difficult to procure medicines which are not either mixed with some foreign substance, or from which some portion of the active principle has not been subtracted by chemical process.

Thirty-three tuns of silver arrived at Philadelphia on Friday, Jan. 27, from the New Orleans Mint, under the superintendence of ex-Marshal Keyser. The specie was put up in small iron covered boxes, and it required no less than six cars to convey it from Pittsburgh to the City of Philadelphia.

Hydrophobia prevails to an alarming extent on the Indian Reservation at Cattaraugus Creek. Several of the family of Bluesky, one of the chiefs of the tribe, have died within a few days, from eating the flesh of a cow which was bitten by a rabid dog, and Bluesky himself is thought to be beyond medical aid.

In the course of an inquest in London, lately, Mr. Wakely, the coroner, observed, that it would be well to acquaint the public with the fact, that if persons in a house on fire had the presence of mind to apply a damp cloth or handkerchief to their mouth and nostrils, they could effect a passage through the densest smoke; but the surest way would be to envelop the head and face completely in the damp cloth.

Three persons—according to the verdicts of coroners' juries—have died in England, in the course of a few days, from destitution. One was a hawker of lucifer matches, who had been in the habit of sleeping nightly on the steps of doors; another was a widow, who lodged with her daughter, a sempstress. With 4s. per week she kept herself and five children. Their food daily was dry bread and weak coffee.

On the New Jersey Central Railroad, they are laying, for the space of two miles, India rubber sleepers under the iron rails, expecting thus to relieve the trains of those sudden jars which ruin the running gear so speedily, do away with very much of the noise, and communicate a springy, elastic motion to the rider.

Gen. Morgan and Dr. Wilson of Fleming Co., Ky., who made an importation last year, have received the invoice of twenty jacks and five jennets, shipped from Barcelona, Spain, on the 13th of December last, which are represented as superior animals. They expect to receive them some time this month. They will be a valuable addition to the mule breeders of Kentucky.

A gentleman writes from Norwich, Vt., that Sunday, the 29th January, was the coldest day of the season at that place, indeed the coldest for several years. The thermometer at 7 in the morning stood 30° below zero, at noon 6½° below, and at 9 in the evening 16½° below.

The clipper ship Chariot of Fame sailed from Liverpool for Boston, on the 11th of January, with a cargo of three thousand tuns weight, valued at £100,000. It is said to be the largest and most valuable cargo that has ever been taken from Liverpool to the United States.

We learn from New Orleans, that Mrs. Mandreaux has obtained in one of the Courts there, a verdict of $20,000 against the New Orleans Railroad Company. The suit was brought for damages sustained in the loss of her husband, who was killed by an accident on the road in question.

Archbishop Bedini is finally gone. He was in New York all last week, although very few persons were aware of the fact. Fearing some disturbance if the embarkation should be at the wharf of the steamer, Monseignor Bedini, attended by a Committee of Catholic clergymen, was received on board the steamer Atlantic, at Clifton, on Staten Island.

A new Hinge has been invented by P. S Bates of Waterbury, Conn., which obviates the necessity of using a spring to cause the door to shut. It is stated, also, that the improved butt will not cost any more, if as much, to manufacture as the old-fashioned kind. The form of the hinge is such that, as the door opens it rises, and falls to again by its own weight.

There is an apple tree in Litchfield, Conn., owned by Solomon Marsh, which measures [illegible] the trunk, is 100 years old, and produced last season twenty bushels of apples, of a delicious quality. Previous to 1835, it had yielded near 100 bushels per annum for ages. The tree was brought from Hartford by some of the early settlers of Litchfield.

The Parliament House and buildings at Quebec were entirely destroyed by fire Feb. 1, together with most of their contents, including a valuable library. There was insurance upon the buildings for $150,000 and upon the library $30,000.

The steamer Georgia, a packet running from New Orleans, took fire on the 28th of January, and was destroyed, with most of her cargo. She had on board a large number of passengers, of whom between thirty and forty are supposed to have been lost.

A dispatch dated Charleston, S. C., Wednesday, Feb. 1, 1854, says:—The steamer Eagle, bound from Columbia to Apalachicola, was totally destroyed by fire on Monday, together with 1,300 bales of cotton. Four negroes also perished in the flames.

The ground at Huntsville, Alabama, was covered with ice and snow to the depth of six inches on the 15th of Jan. Had the whole been of light snow, it would have measured twelve inches—an unprecedented occurrence in that region. The sleighing was fair for two or three days.

Mr. Wait Arnold and Mary Brazee were married, recently, on board the cars of the Western Railroad, soon after they crossed the Massachusetts line into the state of New York. At the next station the happy pair took the back track.

There was a destructive hail storm in the vicinity of Cedarville, Ohio, on the afternoon of Jan. 20th. Some of the hail stones, which were of different shapes and sizes, measured four and five inches in length.

The trouble at Erie is ended for the present. The railroad track is relaid and in order. We think, however, that a change of cars at that important borough continues to be necessary.

The weather has been severe in some portions of the West. At Chicago, on the 23d Jan., the thermometer stood at 16 degrees below zero. At Milwaukee, the mercury was down to 24½ degrees below.

During the last year, the total Chancery suits in Kentucky were 5,353; total common law suits 10,808; total criminal prosecutions, 4,597; total, 20,818.

By the schr. Flash from St. Thomas, we learn that the cholera was raging fiercely there. From the 1st of January to the 18th, there were fifteen hundred persons died, mostly blacks.

One John McGrath died at South Boston on Friday of lock-jaw, induced by a slight wound in the eye from a whip-lash.

The Albany Journal of Feb. 2d says: "The notes of the Mechanic's Bank of Watertown are again refused at the agency in this city."

Twenty buildings in the town of London, the seat of Madison County, Ohio, were destroyed by fire on the 2d inst.

A Mass Meeting to oppose the passage of the Nebraska bill, is to be held at Warren, O., on the 11th of February.

DIED.

In Hopkinton, R. I., Jan. 27th, 1854, after a severe illness of nearly three weeks, Mrs. HANNAH D. WELLS, wife of Silas C. Wells, in the 35th year of her age. Mrs. W. obtained a hope in Christ in early youth, and has ever since given full evidence that the work of grace had not only been commenced in her heart, but was extending its influence onward towards Christian perfection. She did not, however, make an open profession of religion until about twelve years since, at which time she united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, where she remained a devout and consistent member until her death. She bore her sufferings with Christian fortitude and resignation, and in death expressed a strong hope that she should enter into that rest which remains for the people of God. C. M. L.

In the town of Willing, Allegany Co., N. Y., Jan. 31, 1854, of inflammation of the lungs, FLORENCE ADELLA, daughter of Joel C. and Betsey Witter, aged 2 years and 6 months. C. R.

At his residence, St. Clement's Place, New York, on Friday evening, January 13, suddenly, of apoplexy, WILLIAM W. GROESBEECK, formerly of the city of Albany, in the 70th year of his age. A man of God, venerated and esteemed for his meekness, sincerity and godliness. He died in the bosom of his family, full of years—his character adorned with every domestic and Christian virtue. He has thus peacefully closed a long and useful life of exemplary purity and rectitude.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF W. W. G.

Gone! the beloved, kind-hearted man, gone from our daily sight;
Gone, gone forever from our midst his mild eyes' beaming light!
His pleasant word and speaking smile, his low and gentle voice,
That ever bade the trusting hearts of those he loved rejoice!

Gone from our sight! Yes, we will miss him at the hour of prayer,
And turn aside with streaming eyes to think he is not there;
We miss his gentle words of love—how often they did fall—
The kindly pressure of the hand, his greeting to us all.

And if we miss him if our hearts are rent with bitter grief,
To think his pilgrimage on earth, though lengthy, yet seemed brief,
How very desolate must be the hearts of those who weep,
To know the husband—father—lieth in his "dreamless sleep!"

Yet, oh ye stricken, sorrowing ones, bid murmuring thoughts, be still,
And bow with resignation to your Heavenly Father's will,
Remembering that your dearly-loved hath found his home on high,
Hath met his long-lost children in the bright halls of the sky.

Life's restless yearnings, anxious cares, are now forever o'er;
Its "fitful fever," wild desires, can trouble him no more;
I'll breathe a prayer, that all may join him in the spirit-land,
And in that clime united be your severed household band!

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

Life among the Camanches.

The papers give sad details of the cruelties of the Camanche Indians to their captives. A party of Texans, on their way to California, were so cut off and weakened by them, that the few who were left determined to return. Of their capture and subsequent sufferings, the following narrative is given by Mrs. Jane Adeline Wilson, who, with her two brothers-in-law and a Mexican, were all that remained of the large party:—

As we were traveling, about noon, we saw two Camanche Indians charging upon us in front, and at the same time two others were seen driving up behind. We were all very much frightened, and the Mexican jumped out of the wagon and went toward the Indians, in order, if possible, to gain their friendship.

The mules of our wagon, four in number, becoming frightened by the war-whoop of the savages, turned out of the road and commenced running as fast as they could. One of them fell down before we had gone far, and the others were then obliged to stop. The Indians now came upon us, and ordered the Mexican to take the mules out of the harness. While this was going on, I got out of the wagon, and looked on in breathless suspense. After the mules were unharnessed, the Mexican was stripped of his clothing, his hands tied behind his back, and he ordered to sit down upon the ground. One of them went behind him and shot him with a gun, while another stabbed him several times with a large butcher knife. His scalp was cut off before he was dead, and put into his own hat; the hat was then worn by one of his murderers. I was stupified with horror as I gazed on this spectacle, and supposed that my turn would come next. But the Indians having secured the plunder of the wagon, mounted us on the mules, and ordered us to go with them. As I left I looked back and saw the poor Mexican weltering in his blood and still breathing.

We took a north-east direction, and traveled slowly till sunset, when we encamped. Here the plunder, consisting of blankets, bedding, clothing, bridles, and some money which I had in my pocket, was divided among the Indians. Some articles considered useless were thrown into the fire. My clothing was taken away, except barely enough to cover my person. In the distribution of the captives, the eldest boy, about 12 years of age, was claimed by the chief; I became the property of one of the others. I should have mentioned, that one of our captors was a Mexican, who had been stolen from the State of Chihuahua when an infant. He was now as savage as the Indians, and claimed the youngest boy for his prize. The scalp of the Mexican was stretched on a stick and dried by the fire.

After giving us some meat for our supper, the Indians began to secure us for the night. The boys, with their arms tied tightly behind them, were taken under guard by two of the savages. My feet were tied together, and I was obliged to lie between the other two. I did not sleep during the night, for I was afraid of being killed.

The next day we resumed our journey, and traveled in the same direction. The boys were mounted on good animals, and had bows and arrows. Their faces were painted Indian fashion, and they looked like young savages. They appeared to enjoy this new mode of life, and were never treated with excessive cruelty. I was mounted on a good horse, but being obliged to sit astride the animal, the journey was exceedingly painful.

I had a fine head of hair, which I valued very much, but the chief ordered it to be cut off; I was not a little mortified in seeing it decorating the heads of the heartless savages. My head was thus left entirely unprotected from the extremely hot rays of the sun.

Nothing of interest occurred, except repeated acts of inhumanity toward me, until the twelfth day after my capture. At this time we were joined by two Indian men and a squaw. These were all the Indians I saw till after my escape. Up to this time my suffering had been so severe as to take from me all desire to live, but now they were greatly increased. The squaw, from whom I might have expected some compassion, was evidently the cause of the new cruelties which I now began to experience.

My horse was taken from me, and I was mounted on an unbroken mule without a bridle. I had a saddle, but it was worn out and good for nothing except to torture me. This animal would frequently top me over its head of its own accord, but not being wild enough to gratify the malice of the Indians, the chief would sometimes shake the Mexican's scalp before its eyes. The beast would then rear and plunge in the utmost fright, and I would be thrown upon the ground with great violence. I have been tossed from the mule's back as many as half a dozen times a day, and once I was so stunned that I lay a considerable time before my senses returned. My repeated falls greatly amused the Indians, whose horrid peals of laughter might have been heard at a great distance.

I never saw them exhibit the first sign of pity toward me. It made no difference how badly I was hurt, if I did not rise immediately and mount the animal which had just thrown me, they would apply their riding whips, or gunsticks, or the end of a lariat, to my unprotected body with the greatest violence. The squaw would also help me to rise by wounding me with the point of a spear which she carried. You may understand one object the Indians had in view in putting me upon this wild animal and causing me to be thrown so often, when I tell you I expected to become a mother in a few weeks. They understood my situation, but instead of softening their hearts it only made them more inhuman, and subjected me to greater sufferings.

I was obliged to work like a slave while in camp; while there was any service to perform, I was not allowed a moment's rest. I was compelled to carry large loads of wood on my back, which being destitute of sufficient clothing, was mangled till the blood ran down to my feet. I had to chase the animals through briars and bushes, till what little clothing I had was torn into ribbons. I brought the animals to camp in the morning, and had to watch them till they were ready to start, and if one more wild than the rest ran off, I must chase and bring him back, and then be knocked down by the savage chief for my want of skill. When all were ready to start, I had to catch and saddle my own wild mule without assistance. If the party did not start immediately, I was compelled to pull at the end of a lariat which the Indians would fasten to a bush. They seemed to study every method of putting me to death by piecemeal.

Exhausted by incessant toil and suffering, and extreme anguish from my wounds, I could not work as fast as the Indians desired, and often, when scarcely able to stand, and hardly knowing what I was doing, I have been required to do the work of the strongest man. And because of my inability to accomplish my task satisfactorily, I have been whipped till my flesh was raw. Large stones were thrown at me. I was knocked down and stamped upon by the ferocious chief, who seemed anxious to crush me like a worm beneath his feet. My head sometimes fell under the horses' feet, and then the Indians would try to make the beasts kick me. After all was ready for the day's journey, I was obliged to travel as fast as the others, riding sometimes over rocks and through bushes, aching and sore from head to foot, and exposed alike to cold and heat, sunshine and storm.

I have gone two days at a time without tasting food. The Indians depended on hunting for their subsistence, and sometimes had nothing to eat themselves—unless there was an abundance of food, I received little or nothing—when any game was killed, the Indians would tear out the heart, liver, and entrails, and eat them raw. I suffered exceedingly from thirst; I was not allowed to drink, except while in camp. We frequently crossed beautiful streams during the day, and I would beg the privilege of dismounting to quench my thirst. But the Indians would always deny my request with contempt. It was in vain I pointed to my parched tongue and head blistered in the rays of the sun. Nothing could soften them into pity, and I ardently desired death, that my torments might come to an end.

Every indignity was offered to my person which the imagination can conceive. And I am at a loss to know how I have lived through the barbarous treatment which was inflicted upon me. Frequently my feelings were so outraged that I was tempted to kill my inhuman masters. My indignation burned particularly against the chief, and I thought if I could only cut him to pieces I could die content.

We traveled every day—we usually started about ten o'clock in the morning, and halted about four in the afternoon. The Indians were accustomed to go to the tops of the highest hills, and stand there gazing in every direction. We always spent the night on a hill, and were thus exposed to the cold autumn winds; we slept on the ground, generally without covering. When it rained, the Indians made a tent of the blankets and wagon sheet they had stolen from us, but I was not allowed to take shelter in it—I preferred sleeping outside in the storm.

After my mule had become so gentle that I could ride it without being thrown, it was taken from me and I was obliged to travel on foot. The road over which we passed was often very rough and stony, and full of thorns. My feet were wounded and bruised till they were covered with blood and greatly swollen. But still I was obliged to keep up with the rest of the party, and if I fell behind, I was beaten till I was nearly senseless. The Indians often urged me on by attempting to ride their horses over me; many a mile of that road is marked with my blood, and many a hill there has echoed to my useless cries.

I traveled thus on foot some five or six days. After the party were ready to start in the morning, the direction of the route was pointed out to me, and I was required to go before the others, in order not to hinder them. They usually overtook me before I traveled far. I had always intended to make my escape as soon as I found an opportunity. I never expected to reach any friendly settlement, but I did not wish to give the Indians the pleasure of seeing me die. On the morning of the twenty-fifth day after my capture, I was sent on in advance as usual. I had eaten no breakfast, and was very weak, but the hope of escape now supported me. I hastened on as fast I could, and finding a suitable hiding place, I turned aside and concealed myself in the bushes. After this I saw nothing more of my captors. I found afterward, by the tracks of the animals, that they had searched for me; they probably thought I would die, and therefore took less trouble to find me. I have no doubt the next time they pass that way they will look for my bones.

My situation was now distressing beyond all description; I was alone in an Indian country, some hundreds of miles from the nearest friendly settlements. I was without food, without shelter, and almost without clothing. My body was full of wounds and bruises, and my feet were so swollen that I could hardly stand. Wild beasts were around me, and savages, more wild than beasts, roamed on every hand. Winter was coming on, and death in its most terrible forms stared me in the face—I sat down and thought of my lonely and exposed situation. But I could not weep; my heart was too full of woe. I remembered the events of the few preceding weeks. The husband of my choice had been murdered, and I was not allowed the melancholy privilege of closing his eyes, and seeing his remains decently interred. My little property had been stolen, and when within a few days' march of sympathizing friends, I was captured by savages, and after three weeks of indescribable sufferings, found myself wandering solitary and destitute in the midst of the wild prairies—my cup was filled to overflowing, but I resolved to live in hope, if I died in despair.

After remaining three days in the place where I first concealed myself from the Indians, I went to a grove about half a mile distant and built a little house of bushes and grass. Here I lived nine days. My only food was the blackberries which grew on the bushes around. I quenched my thirst at a spring near by. My wounds pained me exceedingly, and I wasted to a mere skeleton for want of proper nourishment. It rained upon me seven nights in succession, and my little house was unable to protect me from the cold storms. More than once I spent a sleepless night, perfectly drenched in rain; while the wolves, sometimes coming within a few steps of me, would make the woods ring with their frightful howlings. They would also follow close behind me when I went to the spring during the day; I expected some time to be devoured by them; but they are great cowards, and I could easily frighten them away.

When I slept I would dream of seeing tables spread with an abundance of every kind of food, but when I stretched forth my hand to satisfy my hunger, the effort would awaken me, and I would find myself weeping bitterly.

When absent from my house on the twelfth day after my escape, some New-Mexican traders passed by on their way to the Camanche settlements. While standing on a small hill, looking after them in order to be sure they were not Indians, I was discovered by some three or four of the party, who happened to be some distance behind. They immediately came toward me, and soon understood my situation. They kindly offered to take me with them, and I gladly bade farewell to my house in the woods. The Mexicans put me upon a burro, and gave me a blanket and some men's clothing, in which I dressed myself very comfortably.

Two or three days after this we came in sight of a band of Camanches, and as it was not safe for me to be seen by them, I was left behind in a ravine, with the promise that the Mexicans would return for me at night. As they did not fulfill their promise, I started toward their camp; about midnight, while wandering among the bushes, a Camanche Indian passed within twenty steps. I thought I was a captive once more, but fortunately the savage did not see me. I threw myself on the ground and waited for day. In the morning I started again for the camp of the Mexicans, but before I reached it I was discovered by one of the trading party who was herding the animals. This man is a Puebla Indian, of San Ildefenso, and is named Juan Jose. To him, more than to any other man in the party, I owe my present freedom.

He told me the camp was full of Camanches, and if they saw me it would be impossible for the party to save me. He made me lie down on the ground while he covered me with dried grass. I lay here all day, and at night crept forth to quench my almost intolerable thirst. Juan came and brought me some bread, and told me not by any means to leave my hiding-place the next day. That day dragged slowly along, and I could hear the dreaded Camanches passing and repassing and shouting to each other. At night Juan returned, bringing another blanket and several loaves of bread, and told me that I must remain here for seven or eight days longer, as the party were obliged to go further on, and could not take me unless I was willing to become a captive once more. I saw the party disappear next day, and it seemed as if my hopes of rescue disappeared with them. But I resolved to wait till the appointed time was up.

In a ravine near by I found a large log which had been left burning; this fire I kept alive day and night till the Mexicans returned, and without it I should probably have frozen to death, as the weather had become very cold. I covered a hollow cotton-wood stump with bark and leaves to keep out the cold wind. This stump was my house during my stay here. When I could endure the cold no longer, I would leave my house and run to the fire, but was afraid to stay there long, lest the Indians should see me. The wolves soon found out my place of retreat, and frequently, while I was in the stump, they would come and scratch around and on its top. The blackberries were very scarce here, and had it not been for the bread Juan Jose gave me I do not see how I could have been kept from starving to death.

The eight days passed slowly by, and I knew not whether to give way to hope or despair. But on the 8th I heard several persons calling to each other. I feared they were Indians, but they belonged to the trading party, and were on their return to New-Mexico. They had lost the place where I was concealed, and were shouting to each other to attract my attention. I was so overjoyed that I rushed toward them unmindful of briars and sore feet. Juan gave me a fine horse to ride, and the whole party treated me with the utmost civility and kindness. On the thirty-fourth day of our return toward New Mexico, we reached the town of Pecos. Here I met Major Carleton and Mrs. Adams of the U. S. Army, who took the deepest interest in my comfort. Here I laid aside men's apparel, and was furnished with a supply from Mrs. A.'s wardrobe. After remaining at Pecos a few days, I was conducted to Santa Fé by the son of Gov. Merriwether.

To Gov. M., and also to the American ladies of this place, I cannot be too thankful for their friendly sympathies and uniform kindness.

The past seems like a horrid dream. I have related nothing but facts, and no language that I can use can fully express the sufferings of mind and body which I have endured. My two brothers-in-law are still captives, and unless reclaimed will become as savage as the Indians. The Mexicans saw them with the Camanches, but were unable to procure their freedom. One is twelve years old, the other ten, and unless the strong arm of Government is lifted up for their redemption, there is no hope for them.

About Barns.

A large barn is far preferable to a small one. Does not every farmer lack barn-room? How many things have you got which ought to be housed, and are rapidly decaying for want of it? Large barns are relatively much cheaper than small ones. To have stacks of hay and stalks standing out of doors, and cattle running out in the winter to eat them in the lots, is poor policy. Hay wastes by summer rains, wastes when fed on the bare ground, wastes by storms during its use, while the top of the stack is off, and wastes by taking a much larger quantity to keep cattle equally well out of doors than in. Nor should corn be allowed, as now, to stand out till the stalks are nearly spoiled. They lose a large proportion of their virtue by being exposed to rain and sun. One load cured under cover is worth four cured out. Now make your barn and its floor large enough to take in your stalks, and they can be stacked on poles thrown across girths five or six feet high, so as to be well aired, yet got into a small compass, and the extra virtue of your stalks, as fodder, will more than double the interest of the money spent in enlarging the barn. Corn-stalks soon perish if out in the weather, yet make the very best of fodder if cured under cover.

To facilitate this and other like ends, and give cattle sun, it will pay cost to have a part of the roof made of glass. Its cost is not much more than shingles, and allows you to have sun in your barn, with which to dry potatoes, corn, hay, &c., in-doors, and will be found very useful for a great many ends of which we do not now dream.

Nor can I see why two or three stories on barns are not as advantageous as on houses. A neighbor of the author drives his grain in upon his second story, where he threshes it—the horsepower being below—which allows the straw to be tumbled down into the yard below, instead of having to be pitched up on to a stack, and lets the grain sift down through on to the main floor, where it is cleaned, and passes from the tail of the fanning-mill right down into the grain bin, still below, in the basement, from which it is loaded into the wagon.

In a great variety of ways, money spent in erecting barn conveniences will save time, money, produce, every thing.

Artificial Propagation of Salmon.

The following description is given by the London Times of the process of preparing the salmon spawn for the hatching-boxes, the writer having witnessed the operation on the River Tay. Mr. Ramsbottom, from Clitheroe, who has experimented successfully for the Messrs. Ashworth on the Lough Corrib waters in Ireland, has the sole management of the Tay ponds. Saturday was a remarkably fine day for the season, and we were privileged in being present at the operation of stripping the fish. When we arrived, Mr. Ramsbottom had got about 15,000 ova in round tin cans, and he showed us an oval-shaped tin box with a lid, which contained a small male fish swimming in water, which, he said, was waiting for his mate. Presently, the net was shot in the Tay at the mouth of the Almond, when two fine female fish, ripe for spawning, from eighteen to twenty pounds in weight, along with a small male fish, were caught. Mr. Ramsbottom, having taken the largest female in his left hand, drew his fingers firmly down both sides of the belly of the fish, when the ova flowed in a stream into the tin box formerly mentioned, in which there were a few inches of water. The fish was instantly returned to the river, and, after a short time, sailed off as if nothing had happened to it. After the ova had been washed by water being poured on and off, care being taken never to allow it to be exposed to the air, the male fish was brought, which all this time had been in the river under a fold of the net, and manipulated in the same manner as the female only a small portion of the milt being required. On the milt being shed, a slight change was seen to take place in the color of the ova, which became paler. Water was again poured on and off, when the operation was complete. The ova was then poured into round tin cases, and carried to the ponds. When we left the river side, upward of 400,000 ova, in a fine condition, had been obtained. We observed that a few of the ova, after impregnation, turned white, instead of being a fine salmon color. Mr. Ramsbottom said they were barren ova. In the month of March the fry will have burst their shells, when we hope to report further.

Advice to Housewives.

Britannia should be first rubbed gently with a woolen cloth and sweet oil; then washed in warm suds, and rubbed with soft leather and whiting. Thus treated, it will retain its beauty to the last.

New iron should be very gradually heated at first—after it has become inured to the heat it is not likely to crack.

It is a good plan to put new earthen ware into cold water and let it heat gradually until it boils—then cool it again. Brown earthen ware, particularly, may be toughened in this way. A handful of rye or wheat bran thrown in while it is boiling will preserve the glazing so that it will not be destroyed by acid or salt.

Clean a brass kettle, before using it for cooking, with salt and vinegar.

The oftener carpets are shaken, the longer they will wear; the dirt that collects under them grinds out the threads.

If you wish to preserve fine teeth, always clean them thoroughly after you have eaten your last meal at night.

Woolen should be washed in very hot suds, and not rinsed. Lukewarm water shrinks them.

Use hard soap to wash your clothes, and soft to wash your floors. Soft soap is so slippery that it wastes a good deal in washing clothes.

Vegetable Instinct.

If a pan of water be placed within six inches of either side of the stem of a young pumpkin or vegetable marrow, it will, in the course of the night, approach it, and will be found in the morning with one of its leaves floating on the water. This experiment may be continued nightly, until the plant begins to fruit. If a prop be placed within six inches of a young convolvulus, or scarlet runner, it will find it, although the prop may be shifted daily. If, after it has twined some distance up the prop, it be unwound, and twined in the opposite direction, it will return to its original position, or die in the attempt; yet, notwithstanding, if two of those plants grow near each other, and have no stake around which they can entwine, one of them will alter the direction of its spiral, and they will twine round each other.

Duhamel placed some kidney beans in a cylinder of moist earth; after a short time they commenced to germinate, of course sending the plume upwards to the light, and the root down into the soil. After a few days the cylinder was turned one-fourth round, and again and again this was repeated, until an entire revolution of the cylinder was completed. The beans were then taken out of the earth, and it was found that both the plume and radicle had bent to accommodate themselves to every revolution, and the one in its efforts to ascend perpendicularly, and the other to descend, they had formed a perfect spiral. But although the natural tendency of the roots is downwards, if the soil beneath be dry, and any damp substance be above, the roots will ascend to reach it.

SINGULAR MANIFESTATION OF NATURE.—The Belfast (Me.) Journal learns from a most creditable source, that a very singular submarine phenomenon has manifested itself in Penobscot river during the last autumn, and up to the present time. At a locality about a mile above Penobscot Ferry, and within about a hundred rods of the Prospect side, where the river widens into a sort of anchoring ground, being nearly a mile across, sometime about the first of September, there was discovered to be a voilent agitation of the water, so that the surface was much disturbed, and stones and dirt were thrown up from the bottom. This up-boiling has continued, at intervals, up to this time. Observation shows that over at least an acre, the depth of the water has increased from seven to fourteen fathoms. A gas is emitted from the water that has the smell of sulphur, or as if some substance of nature was burning beneath. Also, that during the latter part of autumn, two distinct shocks of an earthquake occurred in the vicinity.

FINANCES OF WISCONSIN.—The Message of Gov. Bartow was sent to the Legislature of Wisconsin on the 15th Jan. From it we learn that the whole sum paid into the Treasury during the year amounted to $311,632 61. The disbursements during the same period amounted to $262,489 20. The balance in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1854, was $57,136 48. The estimate of the probable amount to be drawn from the Treasury during the present year, for the general expenses of the State, is stated at $147,210 70. The means applicable to meet the same are estimated at $160,017 84. The School fund on the 1st of January, 1854, amounted to $1,141,804 28—arising almost exclusively from the sale of lands granted by Congress. The whole amount expended in the erection of school houses within the State has been $289,346 89, of which sum $45,071 84 were expended during the past year. The total amount expended in 1853 for the support of common schools was $175,734 17. The State University Fund, on the 1st of January, 1854, amounted to $106,112 07. The number of banks in the State is 10; the amount of circulating notes issued by the Controller, $519,000; and the amount of securities deposited with the State Treasurer, $529,000. The Governor recommends the memorializing of Congress for grants of land in aid of the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and for adequate appropriations for purposes of internal improvement.

SCHOOLS IN RUSSIA.—The number of parish schools is less than 1100 in all the vast territory of the Czar. Besides these are 445 district schools, 521 boarding-schools, and 76 gymnasies. St. Petersburgh, Moscow, and Kief, have lyceums and universities containing a very limited number of scholars; the whole amount expended for schools is 11,000,000 francs, or about 2,000,000 dollars, and this mostly for the sons of noblemen, priests, and public officers. It is estimated that scarcely one in 300 inhabitants of the empire knows how to read. Russia is just about where Europe was in this respect 600 years ago. It should be mentioned, in addition, that there are at St. Petersburgh a superior school for teachers, some military schools, and seminaries for the Russian clergy, and a few special schools for the instruction of girls. This is all that has been hitherto done to develop the intellectual powers of the Russians. "Gross darkness covers the people;" fit basis for the civil despotism and ecclesiastical hierarchy, that crush the bodies and souls of men!

THE COAL FIELDS.—Professor Hitchcock, in his new Elementary Geology, speaks thus of the coal fields of America. The great Appalachian coal-field, extending from New York to Alabama, covers nearly 100,000 square miles; the Indiana field, 55,000. Add to these fields those of Michigan, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Missouri, Iowa and Virginia, and we shall a surface more than 27 times as large as Massachusetts. If we suppose the average thickness of all the beds over this surface to be only 25 feet, then the whole amount of coal in solid measure, in this country, would be not far from 1,100 cubic miles. Estimating the yearly consumption of coal in this country to be 7,000,000 tuns, this immense body of fuel would keep the hearths bright and the furnaces a-glow for more than a million of years.

HIGH PRICES OF CATTLE.—The Scott County, Ky., Importing Company lately held a sale at Georgetown. We give a portion of the prices which cattle sell for out West. Improved Yorkshire hogs, one sow, $150; one do. $160; one do., $100; one do., $160; one boar, $60. Durham bulls brought the following prices: One, called Baron Feversham, $1,525; Pathfinder, $860; Capt. Lanson, $400; Cunningham, $865. Cows and heifers ranged from $405 to $710. Twenty-five Cotswold Sheep sold at the following prices: $290, $475, $275, $170, $250, $160, $103, $90, $155, $123, $125, $170, $105, $100, $150, $151, $80, $157, $165, $160, $175½, $162½, $192, $160, $177. Ten South Down Sheep brought the following prices: $80, $75, $81, $75, $65, $21, $60, $90. Three Leicestershire Sheep sold for $47, $50, $50.

HOUSEHOLD MEASURES.—As all families are not provided with scales and weights referring to ingredients in general use by every housewife, the following may be useful:—

Wheat flour, one pound is one quart.

Indian meal, one pound two ounces is one quart.

Butter, when soft, one pound one ounce is one quart.

Loaf sugar, broken, one pound is one quart.

White sugar, powdered, one pound one ounce is one quart.

Best brown sugar, one pound two ounces is one quart.

Eggs, average size, ten are one pound.

Sixteen large table spoonfuls are half a pint, eight are one gill, four half a gill, &c.

ALL THE GOLD IN THE WORLD.—Mr. Jacob has estimated the existing gold of the world, previously to 1848, (four-fifths of it existing in manufactured articles,) at £650,000,000. Add our new acquisition of £55,000,000, and we have a present world-wealth of gold of £705,000,000. Taking the cube yard of gold at £2,000,000, which it is in round numbers, all the gold of the world at this estimate might, if melted into ingots, be contained in a cellar twenty-four feet square, and sixteen feet high. All our boasted wealth already obtained from California and Australia would go into an iron safe, nine feet square, and nine feet high. So small is the cube of yellow metal that has set populations on the march, and roused the world to wonder!

The Indigo Plant thrives well at the Sandwich Islands, in all moist situations, and grows spontaneously wherever it once gets rooted. In fact, from a single plant, it spreads with great rapidity, covering, in a few years, many contiguous acres, and rooting out every thing else, even the thick sod of a heavy sward.

The editor of The National Era, traveling through Switzerland, says: "We could not but notice that there was far more filth, and squalor, and poverty, and a great deal less industry and thrift, in the Catholic than in the Protestant portions of the cantons."

Rev. Albert Barnes, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, has so far recovered as to be able to preach. It is earnestly hoped that he will be perfectly restored from the malady that has affected his sight.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

Scripture does not, however, make such announcement; its intimations, as might be expected, are wholly opposite. The prophet Isaiah includes all mankind, and specifically "the sons of the stranger," as divinely intended to participate of the blessing of true Sabbath observance, and all that results from it. "Thus saith the Lord, Keep ye judgment and do justice; for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed. Blessed is the man," Jehovah exclaims in encouraging continuation, and in terms which include the whole human race, "Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it; that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." Is. lvi. 1, 2. Most encouragingly is it added, "Neither let the son of the stranger, that hath joined himself to the Lord, speak, saying, The Lord hath utterly separated me from His people; neither let the eunuch say, Behold I am a dry tree. For thus saith the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my Sabbaths, and choose the things that please me, and take hold of my covenant; even unto them will I give in mine house, and within my walls, a place and a name better than of sons and of daughters; I will give them an everlasting name, that shall not be cut off. Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord, to serve Him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be His servants, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant; even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer; their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar; for mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all people. The Lord God, which gathereth the outcasts of Israel, saith, Yet will I gather others to him, besides those that are gathered unto him." (Ver. 3—8.) These statements, which thus close with a reference to the gathering of the "outcasts of Israel," also stand connected with the promises of Millennial peace and blessedness, in contrast with existing sin and suffering, mentioned in the close of the preceding chapter. It is in "the times of restitution of all things, of which God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began," that the promise shall be realized, "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree, and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off." And it is in view of this contrast that the Lord's call in the commencement of the ensuing chapter, from which we have quoted, is given, "Keep ye judgment and do justice, for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed." We infer, then, that the promise to the sons of the stranger has a special relation, in its being yielded unto, to Millennial times—promises which present the Sabbath as a blessing to every one that taketh hold of it. All Gentiles, as well as Jews, who join themselves to the Lord to serve Him, are encouraged by the assurance, "Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the Son of man that layeth hold on it, that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." (Ver. 2.) To all the sons of men, the Sabbath is thus presented as a source as well as expression of holy joy; an institution not peculiar to Israel; so that none need to feel in regard to it that they are utterly separated from God's people. In those days when God's house of prayer in His holy mountain shall be a place of general resort, His law shall be fully obeyed; and prayer and the Sabbath shall also be found mutually helpful by all. To those of the sons of the stranger who love the name of the Lord, to be His servants, the Sabbath is thus put among "the things which please" Him still; and the argument here used to encourage and direct all to present obedience is, "for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed."

And while thus we find promises and encouragments to Sabbath observance, addressed both to the outcasts of Israel and to the sons of the stranger, we read not of their sanctifying two different days. It is one and the same Sabbath that both are encouraged to keep—that which is indeed distinctively and exclusively "the Sabbath;"—and the promises of blessing to fidelity in regard to its observance, are equally presented to both. The Gentiles so keeping God's holy day, and avoiding its pollution, are expressly included in the promise, "even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer."

In the law given by God through Moses, it is farther to be remembered, that when a stranger took part in any of its observances, he was required strictly to conform to the appointed manner. In many things which were absolutely obligatory upon the children of Israel, the observance of the stranger was indeed optional. But if he took part voluntarily in their celebration, he was regulated wholly by Israel's law. "If a stranger sojourn with you, or whosoever be among you in your generations, and will offer an offering made by fire, of a sweet savor unto the Lord, as ye do shall he do. One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, and also for the stranger that sojourneth with you, an ordinance forever in your generations; as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the Lord. One law, and one manner, shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you." (Numb. xv. 14—16.) The stranger is included as having a place in the law prescribing sacrifice for sins of ignorance, in the same chapter, as he is also included in that which awards the punishment for presumptuous sin. "And if any soul sin through ignorance, then he shall bring a she-goat of the first year for a sin offering. And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly, when he sinneth by ignorance before the Lord, to make an atonement for him; and it shall be forgiven him. Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them." (Ver. 27—31.) And it is remarkable, that the promulgation of this part of the law as to sins of presumption is immediately followed by an account of the case of the man who was stoned to death for gathering sticks upon the Sabbath day. (Ver. 32—36

DANIEL'S 2,300 DAYS AND 70 WEEKS.

BY BENJAMIN CLARKE.

"Let him that readeth understand."

1. The subject of the vision is Daniel's people, the Jews, and the "holy city," Jerusalem. Dan. 8: 11, 12, 13, and 9: 19, 20, 24.

2. "The sanctuary and the host"—the holy place, and the "host of the children of Israel," (see Obadiah 1: 20,) were to be "trodden under foot"—"Jerusalem trodden down of the Gentiles." Dan. 8: 13, Luke 21: 24. This we know has been fulfilled for "many days."

3. "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," (in the margin, justified.) "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Dan. 8: 13, 14, Luke 21: 24. That prophetic "days" mean "each day for a year." See Num. 14: 34, Ezek. 4: 6.

4. When do the two thousand and three hundred days (i. e. years) commence? As Gabriel did not give to Daniel any starting point for the 2,300 days during his first visit, (ch. 8,) and as "none understood" the vision till Gabriel came to Daniel again, (ch. 9,) and as both relate to one subject, (the 2,300 days and the 70 weeks,) both relating to Daniel's people, the Jews, and to the holy city Jerusalem; therefore we find only one starting point, or one commencement for both the 2,300 days and the 70 weeks; that is, "from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem," (ch. 9: 25)—in the margin, "To build again Jerusalem." Though some decrees were before given to build the house of God; and though their enemies accused the Jews of "building the rebellious and the bad city," (Ezra 4: 20,) yet Artaxerxes the king commanded that the "city be not builded until another commandment" should be given by him. Ezra 4: 21. And I find no commandment to build Jerusalem until the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. Nehemiah "was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year unto the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years. Neh. 5: 14. The twentieth year of this king, Nehemiah asked the king to send him unto Judah to build the city; and it pleased the king to send him; and Nehemiah "set him a time." Ch. 2: 5, 6, 7, 8. This, according to our common Bible account, was before Christ 446.

5. When do the 2,300 years end? If we add the 466 years before Christ to A. D. 1854, we have two thousand and three hundred years. This present year, A. D. 1854, then, according to our common English Bible chronology, will end the time for the sanctuary and host to be trodden under foot. Jerusalem must not be any longer trodden down of the Gentiles; but God will gather his chosen people to their own land. And "they shall look on him whom they have pierced." "For God is able to graft them in again." "How much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree!"

6. The sanctuary, the holy place, must be cleansed from that power which treads it under foot.

7. By some four friendly powers, called "four carpenters." Zech. 1: 18—21. "Then lifted I up mine eyes, and saw, and behold four horns. And I said unto the angel that talked with me, What be these? And he answered me, These are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem. And the Lord shewed me four carpenters. Then said I, What come these to do? And he spake, saying, These are the horns which have scattered Judah, so that no man did lift up his head; but these are come to fray them, to cast out the horns of the Gentiles, which lifted up their horns over the land of Judah to scatter it." These "four horns," like Daniel's "four beasts"—four universal monarchies—Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman kingdoms—have scattered Judah, Israel and Jerusalem, and have trodden under foot the sanctuary and host—have "scattered the power of the holy people," (Dan, 12: 7,) "for many days." But "the four powers," now organizing in Europe for other purposes, or some other friendly powers, to build up, like carpenters, will have power given them to "cast out the horns of the Gentiles," which now tread under foot the rights of the Jews, and will help to build up and restore them to their former possessions, so that "their governors shall proceed from themselves," and "their judges as at the first, and their counsellors as at the beginning,"

8. The Scriptures show, that God would again "choose Jerusalem," after it should be "plowed as a field" by the Romans. Micah 3: 12 and 4: 1—4. "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest. But in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and the people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come, and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it."

Compare, also, Isa. 2: 1, and 66: 20, Jer. 31: 18—24, Ezek. ch. 36 and 37: 21—28, and 38: 8, 11, and 39: 25—29, Amos 9: 14, 15, Micah, 5: 3, 8, Zech. 10: 10—13, and 12: 9, 10, and ch. 14, Rom. 3: 1, 2, &c. These are some of the many encouraging promises for that people.

THE CHRISTIAN'S PROSPECTS.

Man is a noble creature, made in the image of God, and invested with immortality. The soul, an emanation from the Deity, has commenced an endless existence. The fall has defaced this wondrous work of the Almighty. Sin and its results must be removed, and man restored to moral excellence, and spiritual and holy aspiration, that he may be qualified for an existence compatible with his dignity and capability of enjoyment. The Gospel as an instrument, and the Holy Spirit as the mighty power using it, transforms fallen human nature, and assimilates it to the divine, and then we are made "a new creation in Christ Jesus"—old things pass away, and all things become new. The penitent sinner lays hold of Christ by faith, and then "lays hold on eternal life." As soon as he believes "with the heart unto righteousness," he lays hold (whether he has a clear consciousness of it or not) of that golden chain brought to view by Paul in his addresses to the Christians at Rome. And in proportion as the love of God governs and absorbs the soul, and to the assimilation to the likeness of the Saviour's image, will be the assurance of predestination, justification, and prospective glory. Sin, and the world, and unbelief, only throw us into the shade, and darken our pathway to the skies. The Christian may be sometimes bewildered by allowing himself to be blown about with every wind of doctrine, until he knows not whither he is steering, or whether he is steering to any tangible port at all. Some seem to have lost all scripture ideas of God, heaven, and eternity, and have by their own wild imaginings come to conclusions the most absurd and irrational respecting them all. Let the young and unwary take care that their minds are not corrupted by the foolish reasonings and strange notions of fanatical men.

The Scriptures give us as definite and clear a view of the future state as our present limited capacities can receive. We have a place and a state presented to our view of rest from sin, sorrow, and suffering—not likely to be disturbed by foes or evils of any kind. The moment the chord of life is sundered, the emancipated spirit of the believer is introduced into the blissful presence of the Lord, and to a vast assembly of purified souls, who were justified by the gospel. The soul, ever active from its own nature, is pointed out to us, by the blessed light of revelation, with all its energies untrammeled, engaged in the service of the Lord for ever. And though in what particular ways the glorified spirit will serve him, we are not definitely told, yet we may be satisfied, that whatever may be our sphere of action, and however numerous our duties, all will contribute to our happiness, for praise seems to be inseparably connected with all our activities. The greatness of the future state is brought to view in harmony with our utmost desire and capacity. The soul, with all its mighty aspirations, with all its struggling and graspings, after something great, is met with "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." It has placed before it a magnificent mansion, built by the eternal hand for its habitation. The Apostle speaks of a crown of glory that fadeth not, and a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Then the soul is met in its utmost cravings with entire satisfaction. The intermediate state at length terminates; and all the purposes of God towards earth are fully complete; and then the grandest scene, upon the most extensive and undefined scale, is brought to view. The full redemption of God's people is come. Their bodies, long tenants of the grave, spring up to life in all the bloom and beauty and perfection of immortality. Then comes the shout from myriad voices, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory."

Some have wandered off from these plain and cheering revelations of holy writ, and have become so completely lost in their speculations, that they have consigned the soul over to a state of unconsciousness, and even stripped it of its immortality, until the judgment day. With a wreckful hand they throw all the holy anticipations of the saints—all the triumphs of their last moments—all their supernatural visions of a blessed future, and all the long-cherished hopes of instant blessedness after death—into oblivion, and treat them as a mere delusion, But the everlasting rock of truth is unmoved—the hope of the Christian undisturbed—and the prospect of eternal life after death unclouded. Already the true believer hath eternal life in his soul—his progress is onward and upward—and soon he will lift his head amid the throng of the redeemed, and the brightness and glory and music of Paradise. THE LIFE-GUAGE.

BY ABBY ALLIN.

They err who measure life by years,
With false or thoughtless tongue;
Some hearts grow old before their time;
Others are always young!

'Tis not the number of the lines
On life's fast-filling page;
'Tis not the pulse's added throbs,
Which constitute our age.

Some souls are serfs among the free,
While others nobly strive;
They stand just where their fathers stood—
Dead, e'en while they live!

Others, all spirit, heart and sense—
Theirs the mysterious power
To live, in thrills of joy or woe,
A twelvemonth in an hour!

Seize then, the minutes as they pass—
The woof of life is thought!
Warm up the colors, let them glow,
By fire or fancy fraught!

Live to some purpose—make thy life
A gift of use to thee—
A joy, a good, a golden hope,
A heavenly argosy!

CITY-POOR LIFE

Charles L. Brace, Secretary of the Children's Aid Society, New York, gives the following among other of his experiences in one day, in a communication to the Daily Times:

There is a meek and Christian woman, in a little room of the Sixteenth Ward—a seamstress, and a widow—with two children. She is very sick with the consumption. Her trust and hope never waver, though she has not a friend in the city except her physician and ourselves, whom chance brought there. In the long hours of weakness and bitter poverty, her comfort is in the Bible; for "she doesn't know what it may be for everybody; but there is so much in it for the widow and orphan." She said to me one day, as the winter sunlight shone into her bare and chilly room, "What a blessed thing the sun-light is for the poor!" We gave her help.

I was walking through Ninth-street, toward East river, a day or two ago, when I met a little girl—ragged, but with so sweet and sad a face that I could not avoid stopping her. "Do you go to school, little girl?" "No sir." "Why not?" "I can't sir; I haven't no father or mother, and I must take care of the children." This was said very gently, but with such an expression of settled sadness as I never saw on a child's face. "I have two brothers and a sister, and they are younger than me, and I take care of 'em." "But what do you do? You are very young." (She could not have been more than thirteen.) "I sews, sir," she said, proudly, "on blue check shirts, sir; but it's very hard work," she added, suddenly, and the old, unspeakably sad look came again. "Don't your sisters beg, ever?" "O no, sir, never; they picks up coal and wood in the streets, sometimes; but they haven't no shoes now, and it's hard to go out."

I went that very afternoon to visit her, poor thing—that weary young face, and wearier young heart. They all lived in a wretched basement, with a sick elder brother; and by the help of the neighbors and the work of this child—she had learned to sew and read in one of the industrial schools—the family was kept together. The brother had once been a servant in a wealthy gentleman's house, but he was so poor now he did not dare to ask for help there. The girl, poor as she is, showed the effects of the instruction among ladies so superior to the usual teachers. There was character and refinement in her. We put the younger children where they would be clothed and attend school. We had coal left there.

REFORMATION IN IRELAND.

There is more cheering intelligence of the success of the Protestant missions established in Ireland by evangelical members of the Church of England. The Rev. Wm. Clark, who visited the South and South-western parts of Ireland, the principal seats of the reformation, in October last, makes the following statement, in a letter addressed to the Montreal Witness:—

"The missions of the Irish Church Missions Society are located in twenty-one out of the thirty-two counties in Ireland, and comprise twenty-three distinct missions, seventy stations, sixty-nine schools; and their operations extend over five hundred parishes. Now mark the results, as attested both by friends and foes. The Society's labors have been attended with almost unexampled success. Commencing its work in West Galway, it has been the instrument in God's hand of rendering that district, fifty miles long by thirty broad, characteristically Protestant, which was before characteristically Romish. In this district there were not more than 500 Protestants; now there are more than 6000 converts; and about 4000 children are taught in the Society's schools. I adduce what is taking place in West Galway as a sample of what is going on in other parts. The London Record says: 'Within five years the power of the priests is tottering to its foundation. Converts by tens of thousands have been rescued from superstition, and recovered to the faith of Christ and the practice of all Christian virtues.' The London Times cautiously says: 'We were unwilling hastily to give credence to the numerous statements which reach us on this subject; still, quite enough remains to convince us that the Irish mind is, at this moment, undergoing a change of incalculable importance, and shaking off, at any rate, in some degree, the fetters of its ancient faith.' The Bishop of Cashel tells his clergy, 'The fact cannot be denied, that in many parts of our country multitudes are leaving the errors of Romanism and embracing the scriptural truth of our Reformed Church.' So also the truly evangelical Bishop of Down and Connor, in a speech at Belfast, remarks, 'They could not now close their eyes to the indisputable fact that hundreds, nay, thousands, were not only embracing, but hold fast the pure and holy Catholic faith once delivered to the saints.'

All these statements are fully endorsed by the following Roman Catholic admissions: The Dublin Nation remarks, 'The Irish Nation is fast dissolving, as the Jewish nation dissolved before the curse of God; as the Carthagenian nation dissolved before the sword of Rome; as the Red Indian race silently dissolves before the face of the white man. Ireland is ceasing to be a Roman Catholic nation.' Priest Fitzgerald, in a recent speech, admits, 'Our Nation and our Church are perishing.' An organ of Romanism asks, 'Shall the soupers and tract distributors accomplish the work which all the force of England for three hundred years has been unable to effect?' Again says the Dublin Nation, 'We are afraid that neither the priesthood nor the people of this country have any idea of the system of proselytism carried on under their eyes. Its agents and emissaries—from the wealthy fanatics of Exeter Hall down to the meanest Bible-reader in Connaught—are continually at work, and God only knows all the evil they have wrought. It is full time at least to cease to ignore such a terrible malady. It is full time, and God knows there is full cause, to preach a crusade against it. It has had an incalculable success.'

But enough of Romish admissions; a glorious work is unquestionably progressing, and every true friend of Ireland will earnestly hope that this movement may be made subservient to Ireland's highest interest; that it may, under God's blessing, turn her captivity as the streams in the South—may make her wilderness again as Zion—her desert as the garden of the Lord.

REVIVAL IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

While the torch of war is still being kindled on the confines of the Turkish Empire, it is cheering to know that a milder light is burning in its heart. Battles and revivals are widely apart. We rarely look for the fruits of the Holy Spirit in the vicinage of the war demon. Yet, as we learn from the Journal of Missions, while the waters of the Danube are growing red with the blood of slaughtered men, the city of Constantinople is the scene of a very sweet and interesting revival in the Female Boarding-School conducted by the missionaries of the American Board. Hear what a missionary says of this:—

Our school is enjoying a precious revival. We have evidence that the Holy Spirit is in the midst of us, leading souls to penitence and faith to the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." During our vacation, one of our pupils living in Pera was deeply impressed with the sinfulness of her heart, and her distress became so great that for some days she could scarcely eat or sleep. Her mother, not knowing the power of the Spirit, became alarmed, and thought she was out of her senses, and commanded her to go to rest. She obeyed, but sleep departed from her eyelids. In this frame of mind she came to school. The other pupils, also, on their return, manifested a thoughtful and subdued spirit, and in the second week, when we observed a day of fasting and prayer, as is our custom, several seemed deeply affected. At the close of the day, five came together at a meeting appointed for those who were resolved not to put off coming to the Saviour for a more convenient season. In a week from that time, all of them were hoping that they were born again.

It was interesting to witness the workings of the Spirit upon different individuals, according to their different dispositions. One of them, the youngest girl from Tocat, previously had seasons of deep seriousness, and we all felt great anxiety lest she should grieve the Holy Spirit to depart from her. She has a strong character, and the struggle was severe; but she had resolved that nothing should drive her from the foot of the cross; if she perished, it should be while pleading for mercy. For several days she seemed bordering on despair, though her cries were almost incessant. While listening to the sermon on Sabbath morning, light seemed to break into her soul, and the "new creation" was "manifest" in every look and act. With a beaming face she came and said, "I have laid all my sins on Christ. I feel that he is near me, but am very weak, and shall be overcome by a very little thing."

She referred to two of her companions who had the same feelings, and said, "We feel that the Lord hears now when we call, and we are going to pray till he takes away all sin from our hearts."

She says she does not wish to engage in any occupation, lest Christ should leave her. Once since, this girl, with the others alluded to, came and said that they were troubled that they loved God so little; when they thought of his infinite mercy to them, they were astonished that their hearts were not filled with love to Him.

One timid girl of thirteen years said, "Christ has taken away all my sins, and I am happy, whilst I fear continually lest I grieve my Saviour and thus lose my joy."

A pupil who had been a constant trial to us, for three years, by her inconsistent conduct, although she has a good mind, was so impressed while hearing remarks upon the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, that she went out with tears, and begged one of her companions to pray with her; and after she had retired, and thought all in the room asleep, she lay for an hour or two bemoaning her sinfulness, and half audibly begging for mercy. She hopes her prayers are heard, for she loves prayer, whereas before it was a task.

Two Greek girls, who thought they were renewed previously, have been so revived that they feel that they have just begun their Christian course. The four who are professors of religion have manifested an excellent spirit. Several of the smaller girls are now quite thoughtful, and we hope they will come to the Saviour. The praying closets are not only frequented morning and night, but permission is often sought in school hours, by some burdened or rejoicing soul, to go and pour out her heart in quietness before the throne of her Father in heaven.

THE FISH TAMER.

A few years ago, I read in a newspaper, that the fishes in a certain pond had been tamed, and brought back again, at least in some degree, into the original association with humanity. Being at leisure at a certain time, and having some curiosity to ascertain the truth of this statement, I embarked in a boat in Boston harbor, and in the boat I went down to Hingham. It was near night. Next morning, and quite early in the morning, I went toward the pond, which was said to be the theatre of this interesting and unprecedented state of things. I recollect that I went through a long piece of wood, which was without habitations, and which, in its tranquillity and beauty, was favorable to benevolent dispositions and thoughts. The early sunbeams were playing with the dew-drops; and the birds were singing in the branches. After passing through the woods and coming in sight of the pond of water, I went to a farmer's house not far from it. I knocked, and a good-looking woman, with that intelligent and benevolent aspect which marks the women of America, came to the door. Making such apology as I was able for a visit so early, I remarked, that I had come for the purpose of seeing the fishes in the neighboring pond, which were said to be tamed. Readily accepting my explanations, she pointed to a place on the brink of the water, and said that one of her children would soon come down there.

I had not stood there long before a little girl, apparently anxious not to detain me, came running down. She seated herself on a rock on the shore, and looked into the mirror of the morning waters, which reflected back the delightful image of her innocent beauty. She called to the fishes; calling them sometimes by the names of their tribes, and sometimes by particular names which she had given them. There was one, a large one, which she called Cato. But Cato was in no hurry to come. She said it was rather early for them. They had not yet left their places of slumber. But repeating still more loudly the invitation of her sweet voice, they began to make their appearance. The smaller ones came first, and then the larger ones of many varieties; and at last Cato, who was a sort of king and counsellor in this finny congregation, came among them. Delighted with this renewed visit of their virgin queen, although they seemed to be conscious it was rather early in the morning, they thrust their heads above the water; and she fed them from her hand. And I fed them also.

Observing something peculiar at a little distance in the water, I was surprised to see two turtles making their way toward her.

Selfishness may perish. Indeed, it is dead already. But love can never die. Poets say so—Prophets, who are poets gifted with religious insight, say so. Humanity, which in its better moments embellishes poetry with the inspirations of prophecy, says so. Love not only recognizes life, but is life. He who does not know how to love, does not know how to live. His life is the negation of living. The true life is not in him.

And, now, though abruptly, let me, reader, turn my thoughts in regard to the maiden tamer of fish, into verse:

O maiden of the woods and waves,
With footsteps in the morning dew!
From oozy bed and watery cave,
The tenants of the lake who drew,
Thy voice of love the mystery knew,
Which makes old bards and prophets true.

They tell us of that better day,
When love shall rule the world again;
When crime and fraud shall pass away,
And beast and bird shall dwell with men;
When seas shall marry with the land,
And fishes kiss a maiden's hand.

The iron age has done its best,
With trump and sword and warriors slain;
But could not tame the eagle's nest,
Nor lead the lion by the mane;
With all its strength and all its wo,
There was an art it did not know.

'Twas fitting that a maid like thee,
In childhood's bright and happy hour,
Should teach the world the mystery,
That innocence alone has power;
That love the victory can gain,
Which is not won by millions slain.

O man, if thou wouldst know the art
The shatter'd world to reinstate,
Like her put on a loving heart,
And throw away thy guile and hate.
That maid shall tell thee how 'tis done,
A child shall show the victory won.

Prof. T. C. Upham.

PAINFUL IGNORANCE.

The following incident, reported from Lower Bavaria in the Kolner Zeitung, can scarcely fail to awaken sad reflections in the thoughtful mind:—

A peasant died and was laid out for burial. His niece, who lived in the house, watched an opportunity, when she believed no one saw her, and then stealthily pinned a letter to the grave clothes. That letter was addressed to her mother, who died 14 years ago, and it was the poor woman's belief, that her uncle would find means to deliver it in the land of the dead. It is to the following purpose:—"Dear Mother,—As there is now such a good opportunity, I send you this letter, with the request that you will cause me to dream three numbers in the lottery, for I suppose you are aware that I am very badly off. May be that this paper gets rotten; but as nothing is impossible with God, please to entreat our Lord God (Herrgott,) and give me news of the three numbers which are sure to win, and so I remain your faithful daughter, Maria." The direction was, "To my dead mother in Eternity."

THE CHRISTIAN'S DUTY TO THE AFFLICTED.

The design of God in affliction is not merely to inflict a wholesome discipline upon the sufferer, but also bring into exercise the kindness of his neighbors. On what ground, then, is it devolved almost exclusively upon the minister to visit the afflicted, pray with and comfort them? Why is it not also the duty of each Christian? If a brother or sister be sick, why is it not the duty of any member of the church who knows it, to call and minister, not merely to the wants of the body, but to those of the soul? Why should not his next neighbor go in, and inquire into his spiritual condition, comfort him with the promises of God's word, and, kneeling by his bedside, pray for him? If the widow, or the orphan, be in affliction, and need some encouraging words, why is it not the duty of any Christian to attend to the matter? There is a great outcry against the minister, if he happen not to know of every case of distress within his parish, or should in any other way be hindered from performing his duty. But who charges private Christians with guilt in these things? What private Christian ever reproaches himself on such grounds? Indeed, it is no uncommon thing for church members to say in so many words, that it is not their duty to look after the sick—the sorrowing—the straying; they have a minister for such things.

Now the doctrine that we preach is, that the minister is but a leader in such duties. Standing up to teach the people, he enforces, among other things, the importance of sympathizing with those that are in trouble. Of course, it will be expected of him, that he set an example of conformity to what he preaches. Pastors are directed to render themselves examples of the flock. But example always supposes imitation. If there are to be no imitators, why call upon ministers to be examples? Now when ministers have set a wholesome example to their charges, in visiting the sick, and in looking after other cases of affliction, they have done their duty. It is the duty of the people to follow in their steps.

When the Apostle says, "Weep with those that weep," (Rom. 12: 15,) does he speak to ministers only, or to the whole church? When he says that, "When one member suffers, all the members suffer with it," (1 Cor. 12: 26,) does he mean what he says? Does he mean all, or only the pastor? When, in reference to cases of bereavement by death, he says, "Comfort one another with these words," (1 Thess. 4: 18,) does he address himself only to ministers? When he says, "Warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak," (1 Thess. 5: 14,) is his exhortation to ministers, or to the "brethren?" When, in reference to any one who has strayed from duty, he says, "Ye which are spiritual restore such a one," (Gal. 6: 1,) are we to infer that none in the church are "spiritual" but ministers? When he says, "Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do," (Phil. 4: 9,) does he not mean that believers shall conform to his example in "comforting them which are in any trouble?" (See 2 Cor. 1: 4.) Certainly, there can be but one answer to these questions.

We desire to call attention to this branch of Christian duty, because it is one which is much overlooked. It is true, the Christian is usually forward enough to call upon his sick neighbor, and inquire after his bodily comfort. He will sit up with him at night, will attend to any matters of business for him, will perform a variety of neighborly acts; all which are well enough, and indeed very commendable. But, for the most part, he is as cautious of administering spiritual consolation, and of proposing any religious exercises, as if he expected to be hanged for such things. But, brethren, it is certainly your duty to look, not only after the sick, but after all other cases of affliction that come within your range, and to manifest a tender concern for their soul's interests. It is your duty, if it is any body's. To say it is only the minister's, argues a very low sense of your responsibility as Christians.

Death of Rev. William Jay.—The New York Evangelist informs us that "the venerable William Jay, of Bath, died on the 27th ult., in the 85th year of his age—a man much beloved for his amiable traits and his warm, unaffected piety, and a bright light among the non-conformist clergy of Great Britain. He possessed a singularly well-balanced mind, and not without many elements of true greatness. He was as precocious as Doddridge or Summerfield. In his sixteenth year, he preached for Rowland Hill, in Surrey Chapel, in London, and from that time enjoyed the particular friendship of that celebrated and shrewd observing man. He was settled in Bath in early life, and ministered uninterruptedly to the same people nearly, if not quite, sixty years. Though a highly popular minister, Mr. Jay's most extensive and permanent usefulness has been achieved by means of the press. His sermons and devotional writings have had, perhaps, as wide circulation as those of any other of the age."

REVIVALS.

A little more than a year since, the church in Plainfield enjoyed a revival under the labors of our dear brother Cochran. That revival was cut short by his sickness and death. For a few weeks past, the church has again been refreshed, and most of those of mature age, who were without hope, have professed Christ. A few only remain unconverted, who are the subjects of most anxious prayers. The church in New Market has also received some accessions by baptism.

The two Baptist churches in Plainfield have been holding a union meeting, which has resulted in the conversion of about one hundred souls. The Baptist church at New Market has also received about fifty, and the Baptist church at Samptown about forty. We have hope that some more than two hundred souls, in the circuit of a few miles, have been converted to God. Most of those added to the Baptist churches were persons of adult age. Some of them were old. Those added to the Seventh-day Baptist church in Plainfield are nearly all youth. The suggestion has been made in connection with these facts, that commonly or frequently conversions are earlier in our churches than in others. If this suggestion be true, it is a fact that should greatly encourage us.

Another question has arisen in connection with the conversion of children, which has greatly perplexed parents; and that is, at how early an age may we encourage children to seek and profess religion? When children die very young, it is a great satisfaction to their parents to know, that they indulged a hope in Christ. And yet, at the same age, but few parents would encourage such children, were they to live. We can not reasonably look for as anxious feelings and as great a change in children as in old sinners, but in each case the work of grace may be equally effectual. Experience has also taught us, that those converted earliest are quite as sure to remain faithful as others. It is suggested by some parents, that it would increase their anxiety and responsibility, to allow their young children to profess religion. We can with difficulty conceive why a religious child should cause more anxiety and create more parental responsibility than a sinful one.

We submit, that it is a safe rule to adopt, that when children are old enough to sin, they are old enough to repent; and when they repent, they are old enough to be forgiven; and when they are forgiven, they are old enough to be taken into the embrace of the church, and encouraged in the performance of Christian duties. Our blessed Saviour says, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

TEMPTATION.

Right and wrong are two great opposing principles—ever present with man—ever active. All of the activities of man must conform to one or the other of these principles. If they conform to the right, then the actor is considered as righteous; if they conform to the wrong, he is considered as wicked—a sinner.

Virtue may be simple resistance to the tendencies, inclinations, to wrong. In this case, the actor stands battling the evil towards which he is drawn. He acts simply in the defensive. Man, in such circumstances, stands like a vast rock or sturdy oak resisting the assailing elements. There is, however, a higher manifestation of virtue, or holiness, and that is when man not only resists the encroachments of wrong—warding it off—but becomes aggressive, carrying right into the domain of wrong. This presents a higher moral growth, activity, and power. Mere resistance, inertness, is swallowed up in activity and advancement. Acting thus, we not only ward off evil, but subdue it, making it subservient to high and holy objects.

Sin, on the other hand, is of two grades. It may be a simple neglect of duty. This is rather negative than positive. An individual may not come out in open, active, positive violation of law, yet he may neglect to perform the most important duties of life. Whatever of character such an one may have, may be entirely negative. The difficulty with him is not so much what he does do, as what he does not do. True, there is a deeper form of guilt—an active development—an aggressive movement. Requirements are not only neglected, but law is transgressed. Trangression is changed from passive to active, and there spring up all of those evil agencies at work for the destruction of good—changing all that is light and life into darkness and death.

Temptation is the sinful allurements, the inducements presented to us and operating upon us. Temptation is not sin, but enticements to sin. We sin not, save as we listen to temptation, and yield to its solicitations. Christ was tempted forty days in the wilderness, but he sinned not, because he yielded not.

God has given man faculties of thought, emotion, desire, propensity, appetites, passions. All the faculties of our being were given to us, however, for good and wise purposes, by a wise and beneficent Creator. They will ever prove thus, if kept within their proper limits, and guided by right motives. But we are susceptible of influence. The world with its events rush in to excite, influence us. This influence is sometimes good—sometimes evil.

With such faculties and relations, man stands between two great opposing tendencies, forever operating upon him—one attracting to the right—the other to the wrong. Those attracting to the wrong are called, by way of distinction, temptation—while those inducing to the right are called influences of the Spirit—dictates of conscience—persuasions to good. On the one hand are the good, with God himself, the Supreme Good, leading to the right—on the other, all the evil, enticing to wrong. Man, situated thus, can, if he will, yield to the good, and be led on to virtue—or, if he chooses, he can yield to the evil, and thus be led on to vice. Being thus situated, man holds the keys of his destiny in his own hands. By the favor and assistance of God, he can unlock the gates of heaven—or by the favor and assistance of Satan, he can turn the bolts of hell. This perfect freedom of man to choose which way he will travel—to choose the influences that shall govern him—is one of the important truths which give significancy to the great plan of salvation. This plan proceeds, all along, on the truth that man is at perfect liberty to accept or reject the proffered salvation. Having this power, with him, and him alone, rests the responsibility.

But manifold are the temptations, the inducements, that are continually drawing him away from the paths of holiness. Irreverence, idolatry, avarice, hatred, deceit, envy, ambition, pleasure—in short, everything tending to exalt and gratify self, in opposition to God and man, crowd around and urge him on to sin. In youth, pleasure is the besetting sin, and to it everything is made to bend, unmindful of the future. Then comes manhood, with its cares and perplexities. Strifes, designs, struggling after power and wealth, hot party spirit, opposing interests, press upon the soul. Every period and every relation of life, indeed, has its particular trials and temptations, and it is the part of wisdom to mark well these periods and relations, discover their tendencies, and guard against them.

Marked and opposite are the tendencies, the effects of resisting or yielding to temptation. The characteristics and habitudes of spirit thus produced, are ever becoming more and more distinct during the lapse of time. Yielding to temptation is degrading—withstanding is ennobling. Yielding, man becomes an abject slave—resisting, a freeman. In the one case he is a vessel driven about by tides and storms—in the other, a stern rock battling the elements. He is either chaff before the blast, or a sturdy oak. In this shifting, changing, yielding, there is weakness, meanness—in steadfastness, there is strength, grandeur. Submitting, gives sorrow, remorse—overcoming, gives approval, joy. Yielding, we sin against God, and act in harmony with all evil—resisting, we act in harmony with God and all good. By resisting temptation, and doing our whole duty, we secure heaven and its joys—by yielding, we reap death and destruction. By the former, we do good, not only to ourselves, but others—by the latter, we not only injure ourselves, but others, and upon our heads rests the responsibility.

How shall temptation be resisted? There must be a consecratedness of purpose—a willingness of spirit to conform our lives to the Divine will, and to labor for His glory. This is the starting point, if we wish to run the race of victors—this the chief foundation stone, if we wish to build thereon a goodly, a holy character. There must be a sincere love for truth—an ardent longing for the right—the good. Conscience must be implicitly obeyed. In the language of Burns,

> "Its slightest touches, instant pause;
> Debar a 'side pretences;
> And resolutely keep its laws,
> Uncaring consequences."

For this purpose we must carefully watch—vigilantly guard against every temptation—against every approach of the tempter. Unceasing watchfulness is the price of security. There must not only be watchfulness, but also exertion, warding off, fighting against all encroachments of the enemy—fortifying the weak points of character, and placing a double guard round about them—a diligent and resolute working out of the opposites to what we are tempted. But there is a higher note to life and Christian warfare, than merely warding off temptation by cold, calculating, defensive resistance. This higher note is the true inspiration, the holy enthusiasm received from the realization of the dignity of our natures—of the importance of our relations—our eternal destiny—love to God and man—implicit faith in Jesus—the inbreathings of the Holy Spirit—the power of prayer. Yes, the prayer of faith is the unfailing resort of the tempted. It opens the gates of heaven, and procures for the seeker present and eternal salvation.

THE SABBATH AMONG THE JEWS.

It is quite common to hear the Jews charged with making the Sabbath simply a rest-day—a day of idleness and comparative uselessness. That this charge is unjust, may be learned from perusing the works of any of their standard authors. One of their books has recently fallen under our eye—"A few Words to the Jews, by One of Themselves"—from which we copy the following paragraph, directly in point. Speaking of the Sabbath, the author says:—

"For all it is to be a day of repose, but not of idleness; a day of physical rest and moral freedom, but not of intellectual or moral inactivity. We derive our spiritual example from nature and from God, and the Divine beneficence, mercy, and love have no time of slumber, but are for ever working on around and within us. And thus our mental and moral faculties are to be exercised upon the Sabbath, upon all our days on earth. There are holy fields for Sabbath labors, where love is sown and love is reaped. There are the homes of the weary and suffering to be visited; there are words of peace and hope to be spoken; there is sympathy and care to be administered to those who tread with failing steps life's rugged pathway; there are ignorant men and women, poor sisters and brothers, whose neglected minds require training, and awakening to the beauty of religion and to the power of virtue.

"Such is the mission of the Jewish Sabbath; such the hallowed day bestowed upon the children of Israel. Let us who profess Judaism fulfill its divinest institution. Let us who acknowledge the one Supreme God and Infinite Father obey the sublime commandment that was proclaimed by the Eternal Voice. Let us consecrate God's divine and solemn ordinance to a pure and spiritual worship, to love, to mercy, and to truth; let us realize the beauty and the good of God's day of moral freedom, of God's day of peace and holiness, of God's eternal Sabbath."

PARENTAL DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES.

Perhaps, of things pertaining to earth, next to the health of our children, we may attend to their temporal necessities. In doing this, we are to teach them early, that it is an unchangable law of this life, that we are to "sweat" for our bread. Not that this is the condition of the poor merely—that this law was made for the unfortunate—but for the race. Nor are they to suppose that the possession of wealth excuses them from the obligations of this law; for labor not only procures the "necessaries" of life, but in innumerable ways contributes to man's well-being, and to the happiness of society. Idleness is not only the parent of poverty, but also of vice, crime, and misery, in their most revolting and degrading forms. Idleness is itself a crime—a rebellion against God and the just and merciful laws he has made for the government of society. Parents, therefore, who train their children to habits of indolence and sloth, are guilty of crime, in a broad and glaring sense.

The present condition of society is in this respect alarming. The ingenuity of the age is taxed to devise schemes by which the law of labor may be shunned. I speak not of the improvements in machinery by which the labor of months in former years is so abridged as to be but the labor of a day; but of peculation, craft, intrigue, deception, sly cunning, gambling, and bold dishonesty! Thousands, of the present age, who wish to be thought honorable, are obtaining a living by means really no better than theft, scarcely dreaming that their conduct is censurable. But this hardly reaches the point I wish, dishonorable as it is. There is a feeling with the young of both sexes, that labor is degrading. They are ashamed to be found at work, especially to be found performing the more exacting and laborious duties of life. Perhaps it may be regarded as an evidence of good taste, good breeding, &c., to attend to some of the ornamental branches of industry, not so much because it is useful, as because it is fashionable.

Parents, do you do right when you train your children in these false notions, that industry, only so far as it is fashionable, is degrading? Remember, that want, vice, vagrancy, crime, debauchery, villainy, and crushing poverty, entail themselves, by a law of inevitable necessity, upon fashionable idlers, as well as upon the more vulgar and degraded. Teach your children useful industry, embracing all of the duties and necessities of life.

MISSIONARY MEETING AT WESTERLY.

Pursuant to notice, a meeting having reference to the anticipated departure of our missionaries to Palestine, was held at Westerly, R. I., on the 8th inst. The day was very stormy and unpleasant. Early in the morning, or latter part of the night, it commenced snowing, and continued to do so till it turned to rain, about noon. Two o'clock P. M. was the hour fixed for the services to commence. There was about six or eight inches of snow on the ground when it began to rain, and by meeting time it had become filled with water, so that it was very bad walking, and the heavy and incessant fall of rain at the time made it so exceedingly disagreeable to be out, that many who intended to have been at the meeting could not get there. Indeed, had not the occasion of the meeting been unusual, no one would have thought of going out in such a storm. A goodly number, notwithstanding, were present at the appointed hour. A programm of the exercises was circulated through the house before the time of commencing. But as several of the brethren in the ministry, to whom certain parts of the exercises had been assigned, were unable to be present, some changes in the performances of those duties became necessary, and the exercises were as follows:—

1st. Voluntary by the Choir.
2d. Reading Scriptures (Rom. 11th chap.) L. Crandall.
3d. Singing, Hymn 805.
4th. Prayer, Joel Greene.
5th. Sermon, L. Crandall, from Rom. 11: 31.
6th. Remarks by the Missionaries.
7th. Address to the Missionaries, by Joel Greene.
8th. Singing the 810th Hymn, by the choir and congregation.
9th. Prayer and Benediction by Charles M. Lewis.

A sketch of the discourse delivered on the occasion, and also of the remarks made by the Missionaries, being unavoidably omitted this week, will appear in the next number of the Recorder.

COMM.

Traveling on Sunday.—A case has recently been decided in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, relative to the right of a person to travel unnecessarily on Sunday. It seems that a man named Johnson had been convicted before an Alderman of Pittsburg, of driving an omnibus on a Sunday, and fined $4 for the offence. Johnson appealed to the Supreme Court, which by a majority vote affirmed the decision of the Alderman.

CLERICAL STRIKE.

One of our Presbyterian exchanges says:—

"What has often been remarked upon jokingly, has come to pass. Ministers have struck for higher pay—not to say wages. A body of Unitarian clergymen held a Convention in Boston recently, and fixed a tariff of prices for occasional supplies. They agreed that ministers without charge, supplying vacant pulpits, either by request of Churches or pastors, should receive pay varying from $12 to $25, and expenses, according to the salaries paid. They voted unanimously not to supply a single Sabbath on any less terms.

"They assign as reasons for this move, that such pay is needed; and further, that to supply for smaller compensation, encourages parishes to go on without settled pastors, in order to save money. This last reason is a potent one, and would of itself justify the strike. Our own denomination would be benefited by such a move; for many parishes, on dismissing a minister, will live on temporary supplies a year or two, at about five dollars a Sabbath, and so stave off a part of the ministerial tax, not seeming to care for the spiritual leanness thus induced. I am confident that the Unitarians will not be accused of a mercenary spirit in this measure, neither would unsettled ministers of any denomination be justly liable to such a charge."

Another Presbyterian paper, after having copied the above, says:—

"We take the foregoing paragraph from one of our exchanges, as a long text for a very short sermon.

"Many of our churches seem to think that ministerial labor is not to be paid for at all, unless where a bargain is made for a year. If a vacant church invite a man to supply them for a Sabbath, they seldom think of paying him for his preaching, and often let him even bear his own expenses. We know a recent instance, where a wealthy church paid $5 for four sermons, and the minister came home $1 out of pocket. We think that if preaching is worth hearing, it is worth paying for."

A Universalist paper copies the above paragraphs, and adds:—

"The above are precisely our sentiments. Generally, ministers are very much limited in their circumstances, and have families to maintain. Their expenses, too, are liable to exceed those of men filling other professions, from the fact that they must keep an 'open house,' or 'minister's tavern.' If they fail in paying their just debts, they are condemned, both in their own consciences and by the public, and their usefulness is at an end. It is therefore shameful for a Society to employ a minister without awarding him a just compensation. 'The laborer is worthy of his hire.'"

Agricultural and Conversion Efforts in Palestine.—The comments of our Jewish exchanges upon the efforts now making to promote agriculture in Palestine, show that the Jews generally regard them with favor, under an impression that they have no reference to the conversion of Jews to Christianity. The Jewish paper published in Philadelphia—The Occident—has recently printed two or three articles in favor of agricultural efforts in Palestine. The Asmonean also, the Jewish paper issued in this city, has printed more or less in the same direction. If we understand the views of the Jewish press generally, they are expressed by the following paragraph from The London Hebrew Observer, introductory to a letter which we recently printed:—

"A correspondent of the Sabbath Recorder gives the following interesting account of the progress of agricultural pursuits, which a party of American well-disposed Christians are following in the Holy Land, without any conversion motives, as far as we have yet learned from the correspondence in the above journal. Our Jewish brethren in Palestine seem to embrace the opportunity afforded them for following agriculture with great avidity, and so long as the American party make no attempts at interfering with the religion of those whom they evidently benefit by assisting in cultivating the soil, they are entitled to our gratitude, and to that of the community at large."

Non-Conformity in Great Britain.—Well may Non-conformists place faith and confidence in the voluntary principle, seeing what they have accomplished by it. In the reign of William III., the freeholders of England and Wales were divided thus:—

Conformists	2,477,254
Non-conformists	108,676
Roman Catholics	13,856

and probably the proportion of the total population was not very dissimilar. Now, out of 34,967 places of worship, with accommodation for 10,252,563 people, the Non-conformists of all classes have 20,890 chapels, capable of holding 5,034,648 persons. And of their sittings they make greater use than the Church of England; for whilst it, on Census Sunday, only used thirty-three per cent. of its accommodation, the Wesleyan Reformers occupied forty-five per cent. of their theirs, the Independents thirty-eight per cent., and the Baptists thirty-seven per cent.

Pastoral Emoluments.—The Boston correspondent of the Ohio Observer details the following case: "Having occasion to pass a day with the minister of a parish some fifty miles from Boston, I ascertained that his salary was $450. Out of this he pays $150 for rent, and, for the year 1852, his bill for horse hire was $100. This last item was incurred chiefly in parish labors. The remaining $200 was all he had for clothing, food, fuel, lights, periodicals, etc. He has had to pay the current high prices for every article of living, has a wife and two children, and how has he lived? The answer is, he has lived by running in debt, and his people know it; yet it is a fine farming town, prosperous, and possessed of large pecuniary ability."

Emancipation.—At the late annual meeting of the American Colonization Society, in Washington, it was stated that Gen. Bell, of Tennessee, after liberating 38 slaves, giving them an outfit, and paying their passage to Liberia, was ready to liberate 80 more, and pay half the necessary expenses of sending them to Liberia and supporting them six months, if any one could be found to pay the other half of the expenses. The next day a note was received by the Secretary of the American Colonization Society, from William Appleton, Member of Congress from Boston, announcing his readiness to contribute the required sum—$2,400. These negroes are iron workers, and are represented as a remarkably intelligent, capable, and valuable company of colonists.

The Crystal Palace Association.—A statement has been made public of the pecuniary condition and prospects of the Crystal Palace Association. It seems that the receipts up to Dec. 1st were $891,070 72, of which $489,000 was from capital stock, $330,702 90 from sale of tickets, and the remainder from loans, &c. The expenses have been some $125,000 more than the receipts, which is secured in part by mortgage on the building. Among the expenses is named $533,708 45 for construction, and $107,172 84 for furnishing and decorating the building. The statement says that the disappointment in regard to the financial results of the enterprise is due mainly to the fact of the building not being completed at the time for which it was intended, viz: the first of May, 1853. Instead of a period of exhibition of seven months, the Association had in fact but about three; during that three months the sum received, from the sale of daily tickets, was $245,399 90."

"It is proper to add, what may not be generally known to those who have not recently visited the Exhibition, that it continues open, that the number of withdrawals is very inconsiderable in comparison to the mass of goods on exhibition, that great attractions still remain, and that we have reason to believe that the materials of the next year's display will be as instructive and interesting as those of the past have been."

Education of the Deaf and Dumb.—A bill is before the Legislature of New York, which provides that every deaf and dumb person between twelve and twenty-five years of age, whose parent or parents, or nearest friend, may be residents of this State, and who may make application for that purpose, shall, until provision be made by law for his or her instruction in some other institution or school, be received into the New York Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, provided his or her application for the purpose be first approved by the Superintendent of Common Schools. Each pupil so received shall be provided with board, lodging and tuition, and the Directors of the institution shall receive for each pupil so provided for the sum of $150 per annum, in quarterly payments, to be paid by the Treasurer of the State, on the warrant of the Controller, to the Treasurer of the said institution.

The Nebraska Question.—By reference to our abstract of proceedings in Congress, it will be seen that the attention of that body is at present principally occupied with the Nebraska scheme—a scheme which involves a large extension of the area of slavery, by abrogating the Missouri Compromise, and so admitting slavery into the territories north of the line fixed by that compromise. There is much reason to fear the success of the scheme, backed as it is by the Administration, and supported, as all pro-slavery schemes are, by the undivided South. Still there is hope—especially since the various meetings in opposition at the North show how strong public feeling is against the abominable measure.

Noble Bequests.—The late Mrs. William Swan, by her last will and testament, made the following noble bequests to the charitable institutions of Portland, Me., and elsewhere:

$1,000 to the Widows' Wood Society.
$1,000 to the Fem. Charitable Soc. Portland.
$1,000 to the Female Orphan Asylum.
$1,000 to the Bible Society of Maine.
$300 to the American Tract Society.
$300 for the relief of necessitous female members of the Second Parish church of Portland.

Advance Payment.—A letter from A. E. Burr, Esq., of the Hartford Times, to the editorial convention at Springfield, contains the following:—

"Fourteen years' experience has satisfied me, that advance payment for newspapers is essential to the success of any establishment, either in the city or country. I am satisfied, too, that when individuals, societies or parties use the press for their own benefit, as they are constantly doing by their frequent notices and communications, they should be made to pay for the space they occupy."

Under the auspices of the new President, the Rev. Henry P. Tappan, the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor is maturing its organization on a broad scientific basis. The system of Public Instruction, of which it is a part, is copied from the Prussian, and is designed to furnish as thorough and comprehensive an education as the resources of the country will permit. The whole number of students on the catalogue just issued is 244, of whom 93 are under-graduates and 151 in the medical department.

The amount invested in school-houses in Boston, says the Worcester Ægis, is $1,500,000. The yearly appropriations for education are $1,200,000, while the amount raised for all other city expenses is only $870,000. The amount expended for instruction in the common schools of Massachusetts last year, was $4 50 for each child between five and fifteen years of age in that State.

The Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church, in Alleghany City, was burnt to the ground on the 23d ult. About half of the library, which was very valuable, was saved. The building was insured for $5,000, and the library was partially insured. About forty students of divinity occupied the building, but no lives were lost.

Rev. Dr. Dean, returned Baptist missionary from China, has been in Boston within the last fortnight, and has spoken in several churches. He is now in New York, and such is the state of his health that he will not leave this country for a number of months.

The Trustees of the Pilgrim Society are taking active measures to carry out the plan of erecting a suitable monument to the Pilgrims, at Plymouth. The sum subscribed for the purpose already exceeds $10,000.

The sum of $25,000 was recently sent to the London Society for Propagating the Gospel in China, by a person signing himself "Less than the Least."

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 6.

In the SENATE, numerous reports and petitions were presented, and several private bills from the House were taken up and referred. Mr. Sumner presented a memorial from the Geographical Society of New York, urging the revision of weights and measures by some universal standard. The report of the Joint Committee, expressing the thanks of Congress to the rescuers of the sufferers of the steamship San Francisco, was received, but Mr. Gwin disagreed to the report, and objected to its present condition. The Nebraska question was then resumed. Mr. Wade of Ohio having the floor, addressed the Senate in an able argument in opposition to the passage of the bill.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the presentation of petitions, &c., the bill regulating the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate was taken up, and the Senate's amendment allowing the Secretary of the Senate $1,000 per annum, in addition to his $3,000 yearly pay, was disagreed to. Mr. Walker presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, in favor of providing for the coinage of gold and silver at the Assay-Office in that City. The Committee on Post-Offices reported a bill which requires the Postmaster-General to give immediate notice to the New York and Liverpool U. S. Mail Steamship Company, that the additional compensation they now receive for carrying the mail between New York and Liverpool would be discontinued from and after the 30th September next; and also annuals the contract with George Law and others for the transportation of the mails in the New York, Havana, New Orleans and Chagres line; and the contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., between Astoria and Panama, viâ San Francisco.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 7.

In the SENATE, the bill granting a million of acres of land to Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of railroads 300 miles long, was passed. The Nebraska question was then taken up, but its consideration was postponed one day, in order to give Mr. Everett an opportunity to express his views on the bill. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the reading of the Journal, the Deficiency Bill was taken up. Mr. Clark offered an amendment, which was adopted, appropriating $10,000 for the collection of agricultural statistics and procuring of seeds, to be paid out of the Patent office fund. An amendment was offered and adopted, appropriating $530,000 to purchase the New York Assay building. Other amendments were acted on, and without concluding the consideration of the bill, the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 8.

The SENATE was principally occupied in the discussion of the Nebraska bill. Mr. Everett of Massachusetts, having the floor, delivered a moderate, dignified and forcible argument in opposition to the bill. When Mr. Everett concluded, Mr. Smith, of Conn., obtained the floor, and the discussion was postponed. Mr. Brodhead presented memorials from the Society of Friends, of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, against the continuance of domestic Slavery, and remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Mr. Hamlin presented memorials in favor of reducing the duty on imported iron to $15 per tun; also, in favor of reducing the duty on charcoal iron to $12 per tun. The bill granting lands to Michigan, for railroad purposes, was passed. The French Spoliation bill was then taken up and read through.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Cutting made an ineffectual attempt to present the remonstrance of the New York Tabernacle meeting against the passage of the Nebraska bill. The Deficiency bill was then taken up, and occupied the remainder of the day.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 9.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented a remonstrance from the citizens of New York against the passage of the Nebraska bill. The French Spoliation bill was then taken up, and after some debate on the subject its consideration was postponed. The discussion of the Nebraska bill was then resumed. Mr. Smith of Conn. having the floor, spoke in opposition to the bill. He did not touch upon the Slavery question, but confined his discussion to the propriety of organizing the Territory at all. He showed that there are, properly speaking, no inhabitants there; that there are already more territories than are wanted; that there is no occasion for the expense of instituting another, and that, by solemn pledges, the region now in question belongs to the Indian tribes which have been removed there. Many acts of Congress stand in the way of the proposed measure, and to effect it requires not only the abrogation of the Missouri Compromise, but of a great deal of our existing legislation beside. Mr. Smith had not concluded when the Senate adjourned.

The consideration of the Deficiency bill occupied the attention of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. The amendment appropriating $530,000 for the purchase of the building for the use of the New York Assay Office, was rejected by a vote of 93 Nays to 57 Yeas. Several amendments appropriating moneys for custom-houses were concurred in—among which were $10,000 each for Cincinnati and Louisville Custom-Houses; $20,000 each to Bath and Bangor Custom-Houses; $100,000 for St. Louis Custom-House, and $12,000 for Custom-House at Wilmington, Del.; an appropriation of $35,000 was made for Marine Hospital at Cleveland, Ohio.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 10.

In the SENATE, two or three private bills were passed; after which Truman Smith resumed and finished his speech on the Nebraska question. Mr. Weller then got the floor, and the subject was postponed to Second-day.

The HOUSE passed two or three private bills, and then adjourned over to Second-day.

The following are the joint resolutions presented to the Senate by the Committee on the loss of the San Francisco:—

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to procure three valuable gold medals, with suitable devices, to be presented one to Capt. Creighton of the ship Three Bells of Glasgow, one to Capt. Low of the bark Kilby of Boston, and one to Capt. Stouffer of the ship Antarctic, as testimonials of national gratitude for their gallant conduct in rescuing about five hundred Americans from the wreck of the San Francisco, and that the cost of the same be paid out of the Treasury.

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President to reward in such manner as he may deem appropriate, the officers and crews of those vessels that aided in the rescue of the survivors of said wreck; and such other persons as distinguished themselves by offices of humanity and heroism on the occasion—the reward to be proportionate to the nature of the efforts made and the merit of the services rendered, so far as the same can be ascertained.

European News.

The U. S. Mail steamship Pacific arrived at New York on the 9th inst., bringing four days later news from Europe.

The news brought by the Pacific in a great measure restores to the Turkish difficulties that character of a vast mystification which from the first they have so often borne.

On the 13th January, the Russians had again attacked Matschin, and when accounts left, the battle was raging fiercely, the Turks defending themselves with their usual bravery.

The packet-ship Antarctic, from New York, arrived at Liverpool Monday evening, Jan. 23d, brought a portion of the passengers and crew of the ill-fated steamer San Francisco. One hundred and forty-two persons were washed overboard from the San Francisco previous to the above ship's falling in with her, and fifty-nine died after being received on board the Antarctic.

There has been a coup d'état in Spain. On the 16th of January a council of ministers determined to punish certain refractory politicians, and accordingly the following generals were subjected to a decree of exile: Manuel Concha to the Canaries; José Concha (late Captain-General of Cuba) to Majorca; O'Donnell (also an ex Captain-General of Cuba) to the Canaries; Infante to Ivica; and Armero to Leon; and the whole lot had to decamp the next day. Besides these, sixty of the parliamentary opposition are to be exiled. Some journalists also will be packed off.

From China, we hear that quiet prevails at Amoy, and the constituted authorities have been restored. The insurgent army had, at the end of October, reached Ginken, about 60 miles from Pekin. Shangbae is still in the hands of the patriots. At Canton, trade dull. At Shanghae, trade brisk and supplies of tea large.

California News.

The steamer Star of the West, with two weeks later news from California, arrived at New York on the 9th inst.

The dates from San Francisco are to Jan. 16. By the steamers of that date about $2,000,000 in gold were shipped from San Francisco, nearly $800,000 of which are brought by the Star of the West.

The reports from the mines are less glowing than usual. Drouth had prevailed extensively, and in consequence the yield of gold was less than during any previous portion of the year.

The principal feature of the news by this arrival relates to the freebooting expedition against Lower California. It is stated that the Mexicans have submitted to the new Government, and that the wealthy rancheros cherish a favorable disposition toward President Walker. This is the version of the story on the fillibuster side, while accounts from Mazatlan declare that active measures are in preparation to recover the territory from the invading band.

The annual message of Gov. Bigler states that the actual amount of State indebtedness Jan. 1, 1854, is $3,001,495 70. The amount of gold dust shipped from California in 1853, is $82,300,399 42, more than half the total amount of exports of all other states of the Union, the estimated amount from the other States being, in 1852, $154,931,147.

Considerable excitement was caused in San Francisco on the evening of the 4th Jan. by the arrest of one hundred and fifty-nine Chinamen, who were carried to the station-house. Information was lodged with the police, that a difficulty was likely to occur between the different Chinese residents, and it was said that one portion was about to force others to pay a tax. The police accordingly proceeded to a place designated, and made the arrests before mentioned. Upon the examination it appeared that a Lodge of the Triad Society was about being formed, to sympathize with and aid the revolution in China. They were all discharged.

Disastrous Fire at New Orleans.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Saturday, Feb. 4, 1854, says: At 3 o'clock this afternoon the steamer Charles Belcher, just arrived from Nashville, caught fire, and in a short time was totally consumed, with her valuable cargo of cotton, tobacco and Western produce. Thirty-two negroes and five white men have perished in the flames! They were persons chiefly employed on the boats. The flames spread with frightful rapidity, and in a short while extended to the steamers lying alongside, at the levee.

The steamer Natchez, just arrived, with her cargo of 2,000 bales of cotton, was entirely destroyed. The steamboat Cairo next caught fire and was burned. The steamboat Sultana, with Madame Sontag on board, caught fire, but the flames were extinguished before much damage was done. A number of barges lying at the levee, loaded with produce consigned to various houses, were also greatly damaged. An immense amount of produce—cotton, flour, provisions and hemp—was on board these vessels, all of which is destroyed. An immense amount of produce on the wharves was also consumed.

Six steamboats were consumed in the conflagration, namely: the Charles Belcher, Natchez, Mohegan, Saxon, Grand Turk, Leah and Luna. They were valued at $300,000, and mostly insured in Western offices. The total loss is variously estimated at from $700,000 to $1,000,000.

[Later accounts indicate that the loss of life was not as great as above represented.]

E. M. Gould has recovered a verdict of $10,000 damages against Messrs. Gardiner, Joger & Co., of New-Orleans, for false imprisonment.

BURNING OF A STEAMBOAT.—The steamboat Georgia, Capt. Sinnott, from Montgomery, Ala., was burned at the wharf, at the lake end of the Jefferson and Pontchartrain Railroad, on Saturday night, Jan. 31, at about 10½ o'clock. The boat had just arrived at the wharf, and a bow line thrown out and secured to the wharf, when the boat was discovered to be on fire. A stern line was thrown out at once, but in the hurry it was not secured to the wharf. The stern of the boat, therefore, swung out from the wharf for a minute or two. The fire caught around the boilers, and the wood work of the boat being much heated, it spread with astonishing rapidity over the boat and cotton. The passengers were nearly all in the cabin, and the flames rising up from the forward part of the boat, prevented many of them from escaping.

There were 185 passengers on board, including children and negroes. Of this number, it is certain that thirty perished; some of the firemen saved, think that fifty were lost, but from the most diligent inquiries, we think that forty is nearer the actual number lost. Twenty-two of the above number were slaves belonging to persons on board.

DAMAGES IN A RAILROAD CASE.—The case of John F. Paull vs. the Boston and Worcester Railroad Corporation has been on trial in the Supreme Judicial Court during the past week, Judge Merrick presiding. The facts of the case are briefly these: On the 11th of April, 1851, the plaintiff, a baker, was passing down Kneeland street, and came to the crossing of the railraod, and seeing and hearing no warning or alarm whatever, he attempted to pass over. Before he had passed the fifth of the eight tracks at the crossing, a train of cars came out of the dépot, struck the wagon, severed the horse from the wagon, and bore the vehicle some sixty feet down the track, and completely destroyed it. Mr. Paull was buried beneath the fragments, and he was taken out with his foot crushed, his hand maimed, and he received other damages which have made him a cripple for life. The Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed damages at $2,000.

THE STOCKBRIDGE INDIANS.—There is a delegation from this tribe now in Washington. These Indians, the remnant of the once celebrated Mohican tribe, number not more than one hundred and fifty souls. According to a tradition among them, New York City was once the site of their chief town. Thence they removed to Stockbridge, in Oneida County, New York. Civilization pressing upon them there, they went West to a new home on the St. Mary's river, in Indiana. In 1828, they again fled before the face of the white man, seeking a refuge in Wisconsin. Not long since, they treated with the Government for the exchange of their lands there for others in Minnesota. The tribe are now, however, anxious to remain in Wisconsin, having, in almost all things, adopted the habits and pursuits of the whites. The delegation are negotiating with the Indian Bureau for the annullment of the treaty last above mentioned.

SUMMARY.

Capt. Degroot, who has just sold his interest in the "Prescott House," New York, for 100,000 dollars, (75,000 dollars for the furniture and 25,000 for the "good will,") is about to build a new Hotel of mammoth dimensions. It will be built in the castellated style of architecture—furnished with Elizabethan furniture, and will cost 500,000 dollars. To this must be added the price of lot, decorations, &c., which will use up some 300,000 dollars more. This will make the whole cost of the edifice 800,000 dollars. The architect is Mr. Renwick. The new hotel will be ready for the reception of visitors in the spring of 1855. It is to be called "The Great West."

Mr. Albert S. Ely, the town collector of taxes for the town of Stockbridge, Madison County, has been missing since Friday morning, Jan. 27. He had collected all the taxes of the town, and on Thursday paid into the hands of the Commissioners of highways, the money appropriated to their use, some five or six hundred dollars, taking a receipt therefore; and early Friday morning he started for Morrisville, with about $800, for the purpose of settling with the County Treasurer, since which time he has not been heard of. He was considered a very honest man, and it is believed by those who knew him that he has been murdered.

It is a remarkable fact, that of the only three four-masted sailing ships that were ever built, none have been fortunate. The first was the Columbus, built in British North America, and she was the only one that performed a passage. After her arrival in London, about the year 1824, she was sent back to Canada, and on her passage out was lost in the Bay of Biscay. The next was the Baron of Renfrew, a larger one yet. She was lost on her first passage, at Gravelines, on the coast of France; and the last is the unfortunate Great Republic, whose career is still shorter.

The London Times publishes a table of the temperature of the coldest days in England since 1810. It appears that Jan 3, of the present year, the weather was 7 degrees colder than at any time during that period, the thermometer having fallen to four degrees below zero, which, for England, is something very extraordinary. All accounts that we have seen, state that the season has been unexampled in severity. Nobody can remember any thing like it. Two of the London police were found frozen to death on the night of the 3d Jan.

A dispatch dated Toledo, Ohio, Monday, Feb. 6, 1854, says: At 3 o'clock this morning a fire broke out in this city, in a boarding house occupied by some dozen persons. When discovered, the flames had made such headway as to cut off all chance to the inmates to escape by the doorway. An awful spectacle ensued. The frantic inmates were seen at the windows surrounded by flames and shrieking for help. Four children were thrown into the street and were followed by their parents. Four were unable to escape, and perished in the flames.

A pigeon roost, ten miles long by five broad, in Franklin County, Indiana, is now swarming with pigeons. The roar of their wings on arriving and departing from the roost is tremendous; and the flocks, during flight, darken the heavens. The ground is covered to the depth of several inches with their manure. Thousands are killed by casualties from breaking limbs of trees, and hundreds of hogs live upon them. Sportsmen are tired of killing game so easily obtained.

A man by the name of J. E. Berthe, was arrested on the steamer Mary Hunt, at Evansville, recently, charged with the murder of a man in Mississippi. He belongs to a wealthy and highly respectable family. About two years ago, he had a difficulty with a son of Gen. Bingham of Mississippi, a celebrated sportsman, and killed him. He fled to South America, but ventured home again before his identity was forgotten. He confessed himself the man, as soon as arrested, and was taken back, where a reward of $1,000 was offered for him.

The Chicago and Rock Island Road will open to through business by the 23d inst. It would have been ready by the 1st of February, but for the delay of locomotives cast of Erie by the riots. The distance from Chicago to Rock Island, on the Mississippi, opposite the town of Davenport, Iowa, is 181 miles. The line of the road will extend from Davenport, under the name of the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, toward the Missouri River.

The time occupied in taking and completing the Census of 1850 was three years and five months. In 1840 it was published in one year after it was commenced. In 1830 in two years after it was taken. The expenses of taking the Census in 1790 were $44,377. In 1800, $66,109. In 1810, $174,444. In 1820, $208,525. In 1830, $378,545. In 1840, $833,370. In 1850, $1,318,023.

The Court of Appeals recently decided that where the use or keeping of Camphene was prohibited in the policy of insurance, the fact of its being kept or used annulled the policy, and if its use or storage on the premises should be discontinued, the policy would still be void, and further, if a fire occurred from other causes by which the premises were destroyed the insured could not recover.

Some months ago, Alderman Sturtevant was sentenced to pay a fine of $250 and imprisonment for fifteen days, for contempt of court, in disobeying an injunction against passing the Broadway railroad bill, accompanying his disobedience with a gross abuse of the judge who issued the injunction. The fifteen days were whittled down to three by some legal chicanery, but so much of imprisonment the Alderman had to submit to.

We learn from the Hardin Co. (Ohio) Republican, that the Treasury office in that County was broken into on the night of the 25th, and $2,789 stolen from the safe, which was opened by a skeleton key, manufactured by the burglars on the spot. About $7,000 was in the office at the time, but the thieves overlooked the biggest part of it, which had been placed between the leaves of an old scrap-book.

Before Judge Williams at Pittsburgh, Wednesday, Feb. 8, 1854, McCloskey's administrators obtained a verdict against the Pennsylvania Railroad for $4,500. McCloskey was conveying horses from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia when he was killed in March last by a collision near Newton. The defense set up was that he was on the wrong car at the time of the accident.

The new clipper ship Red Jacket, Capt. Asa Eldridge, which sailed from New York on the 10th ult., for Liverpool, made the passage from Sandy Hook to the Bell Buoy in twelve days. The best day's work was 384 and the next 376 miles; in the English Channel she came up with and passed a channel steamer. The Red Jacket was built at Rockland, Me., is of 2,430 tuns register.

The fires in London during 1853 have reached nearly 1053—that is, from January, 1853—to which is added great sacrifice of human life; and property destroyed amounts to at least £200,000,000 sterling. Out of the latter sum a great many thousands were sacrificed as paper manufactories and paper mills—about the twentieth of the amount.

Shepard, the residuary legatee of Judah Touro, annonnces that he will, in accordance with the will of Mr. T., pay over to the city authorities of New Orleans, a sum of from $200,000 to $300,000, for the purpose of establishing the Alms-House named in the will, and for improving and embellishing Canal-st.

The Dubuque Tribune publishes a statement of the valuation of real and personal property in Iowa, for the years 1851, 1852, and 1853, by which it appears that the State is rapidly growing in wealth. The assessment for 1851, was $28,464,550; for 1852, $38,427,376, and for 1853, $49,384,900.

A dispatch dated Charleston, S. C., Wednesday, Feb. 8, 1854, says:—The Girard East Alabamian learns that the steamer America was burned on Alabama River, on the 29th January, and fifty lives were lost. Mr. Hanna, of Jacksonville, Fla., has shown the Republican a specimen of lemons grown in the grove of Dr. Speer at Mellonville, which measures an equatorial line of 12½ inches, and 14½ inches round the poles. Weight 1 lb. Dr. Speer has at present about 250 bearing lemon trees; 1,200 growing trees, of which about half will bear next year. He has shipped 80,000 lemons the present year.

In Whitestown, Oneida Co., N. Y., on the 7th inst., NATHAN WILCOX, in the 35th year of his age.

In Willing, Allegany Co., N. Y., Feb. 3d, JOHN B. S. HALLETT, son of Samuel and Margaret Hallett, aged 3 years, 7 months, 17 days. Funeral discourse by Eld. N. V. Hull.

In Portville, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., Jan. 23, 1854, of consumption, Mrs. EMILY H. MAIN, wife of Dea. Sheffield B. Main, in the 54th year of her age. Sister Main experienced religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott. From that place, she removed her standing to the Church in Lincklaen; and in the year 1833, she with her husband and family removed west, and was one of the few who constituted the 2d Genesee Church at its organization, of which she remained a faithful member until God said, "It is enough—come up higher." Sister Main endured a long and painful illness with Christian fortitude, and within a few hours of her death, as if in haste to depart and be with Christ, she repeated the following lines:—

"How long, dear Saviour, O how long,
Will that glad hour delay?"

Then, as if fearful she was exercising impatience, she prayed that she might, like Job, wait her appointed time, until her change come. When the hour of her departure arrived, she called her weeping husband and children around her dying bed, bade them all farewell, exhorting them to live faithful to God, and her glad spirit was carried by angels to rest in Abraham's bosom.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

The South-land hath its fields of cane,
The prairie boasts its heavy grain,
And sunset's radiant gates unfold
On crowded marts and sands of gold.

Rough, bleak, and cold, our little State
Is hard of soil, of limits straight;
Her yellow sands are sands alone;
Her only mines are ice and stone.

From Autumn frost to April rain,
Too long her winter woods complain;
From budding flower to falling leaf,
Her summer time is all too brief.

But on her rocks, and on her sands,
And stormy hills, the school-house stands;
And what her rugged soil denies,
The harvest of the mind supplies.

The treasures of the Commonwealth
Are free, strong minds, and hearts of wealth;
And more to her than gold or grain,
Are cunning hand and cultured brain.

For well she keeps her ancient stock,
The stubborn strength of Plymouth rock;
And still maintains, with milder laws
And clearer light, the Good Old Cause!

Washington's Farewell to his Army;

A Historical Sketch.

The Revolution was over. Eight years' conflict had ceased, and the warriors were now to separate forever, turning their weapons into plow-shares, and their camps into work-shops. The spectacle, though a sublime and glorious one, was yet attended with sorrowful feelings; for, alas! in the remains of that gallant army of patriotic soldiers, now about to disband without pay, without support, stalked poverty and disease. The country had not the means to be grateful.

The details of the condition of many of the officers and soldiers at that period, according to history and oral tradition, were melancholy in the extreme. Possessing no means of patrimonial inheritance to fall back upon—thrown out of even the perilous support of the soldier at the commencement of winter, and hardly fit for any other duty than that of the camp—their situation can better be imagined than described.

A single instance, as a sample of the situations of many of the officers, as related of the conduct of Baron Steuben, may not be amiss. When the main body of the army was disbanded at Newburgh, and the veteran soldiers were bidding farewell to each other, Lieutenant Colonel Cochran, an aged soldier of the New Hampshire line, remarked, with tears in his eyes, as he shook hands with the Baron—

"For myself, I could stand it; but my wife and daughters are in the garret of that wretched tavern; and I have no means of removing them."

"Come, come," said the Baron, "don't give way thus. I will pay my respects to Mrs. Cochran and her daughters."

When the good old soldier left them, their countenances were warm with gratitude—for he left there all he had. In one of the Rhode Island regiments were several companies of black troops who had served through the whole war, and their bravery and discipline were unsurpassed. The Baron observed one of these poor negroes on the wharf at Newburg, apparently in great distress.

"What is the matter, brother soldier?"

"Why, master Baron, I want a dollar to get home with, now the Congress has no further use for me."

The Baron was absent for a few moments, and then returned with a silver dollar, which he had borrowed.

"There, it's all I could get. Take it."

The negro received it with joy, hailed a sloop which was passing down the river to New York, and as he reached the deck took off his hat and said—

"God bless you, master Baron!"

These are single illustrations of the army at the close of the war. Indeed, Washington had this view at the close of his farewell address to the army at Rock Hill, in November, 1783.

"And being now about to conclude these his last public orders, to take his ultimate leave in a short time of the military character, and to bid a final adieu to the armies he had so long had the honor to command, he can only again offer in their behalf his recommendations to their country, and his prayer to the God of armies.

"May ample justice be done them here, and may the choicest of Heaven's favor, both here and hereafter, attend those who, under divine auspices, have secured innumerable blessings for others.

"With these wishes, and this benediction, the Commander-in Chief is about to retire from service. The curtain of separation will soon be drawn, and the military scenes to him will be closed forever."

The closing of the "military scenes" I am about to relate.

New York had been occupied by Washington on the 25th of November. A few days afterwards he notified the President of Congress—which body was then in session at Annapolis, in Maryland—that, as the war had now closed, he should consider it his duty to proceed thence and surrender to that body the commission which he had received from them seven years before.

The morning of the 5th of December, 1783, was a sad and heavy one to the remnant of the American army in the city of New York. The noon of that day was to witness the farewell of Washington—he was to bid adieu to his military comrades forever. The officers who had been with him in solemn council, the private who had fought and bled in the "heavy fight," under his orders, were to hear his commands no longer. The manly form and dignified countenance of the "great captain" was henceforth to live in their memories.

As the hour of noon approached, the whole garrison, at the request of Washington himself, was put in motion and marched down Broad street to Francis' tavern, his head-quarters. He wished to take leave of private soldiers alike with the officers, and bid them all adieu. His favorite light infantry were drawn up in the line facing inward, through Pearl street to the foot of Whitehall, where a barge was in readiness to convey him to Powell's Hook.

Assembled there were Knox, Greene, Clinton, Steuben, Gates, and others, who had served with him faithfully and truly in the "tented field;" but, alas! where were the others that had entered the war with him seven years before? Their bones crumbled in the soil from Canada to Georgia. Montgomery had yielded up his life at Quebec; Wooster fell at Danbury; Woodhull was barbarously murdered while a prisoner at the battle on Long Island, and Mercer fell mortally wounded at Princeton; the brave and chivalric Laurens, after displaying the most heroic courage in the trenches of Yorktown, died in a trifling skirmish in South Carolina; the brave but eccentric Lee was no longer living, and Putnam, like a helpless child, was stretched upon a bed of sickness. Indeed, the battle-field and time had thinned the ranks which entered with him on the conflict of independence.

Washington entered the room—the hour of separation had come. As he raised his eye and glanced on the faces of those assembled, a tear coursed down his cheek, and his voice was tremulous as he saluted them. Nor was he alone. Men, "albeit unused to the melting mood," stood around him, whose uplifted hands to cover their brows, told that the tears, which they in vain attempted to conceal, bespoke the anguish they could not hide.

After a moment's conversation, Washington called for a glass of wine. It was brought him. Turning to the officers, he thus addressed them:—

"With a heart full of love and gratitude, I now take my final leave of you; and I most devoutly wish your latter days may be as prosperous and happy as your former ones have been glorious and honorable." He then raised the glass to his lips, and added, "I cannot come to each of you to take my leave, but shall be obliged to you if each of you will take me by the hand."

General Knox, who stood nearest, burst into tears, and advanced incapable of utterance. Washington grasped him by the hand, and embraced him. The officers came up successively and took an affectionate leave. No words were spoken, but all was the "silent eloquence of tears." What were mere words at such a scene? Nothing. It was the feeling of the heart—thrilling, though unspoken.

When the last officer had embraced him, Washington left the room, followed by his comrades, and passed through the line of light infantry. His step was slow and measured, his head uncovered, and tears flowed thick and fast, as he looked from side to side at the veterans to whom he was now to bid adieu forever. Shortly an event occurred more touching than all the rest. A gigantic soldier, who had stood by his side at Trenton, stepped forth from the ranks and extended his hand.

"Farewell, my beloved General, farewell."

Washington grasped his hand, in convulsive emotion, in both of his. All discipline was now at an end. The officers would not restrain the men as they rushed forward to take Washington by the hand, and the violent sobs and tears of the soldiers told how deeply engraved upon their affections was their love of their commander.

At length Washington reached the barge Whitehall, and entered it. At the first stroke of the oars he rose, and turning to the companions of his glory, by waving his hat, bade them a silent adieu. Their answer was only in tears, and the officers and men, with glistening eyes, watched the receding boat till the form of their noble commander was lost sight of in the distance.

Propagation and Culture of Trees.

I have derived great pleasure and profit from the perusal of the writings of those engaged, as I am, in growing fruit trees, whether for sale or in the orchard. Still there are many things which I do not do just as I understand others to do in similar cases, and I have supposed it might afford at least some amusement to state briefly the leading points in which my practice differs from that of most all others. Of course no one will adopt these strange notions unless upon the conviction of his own judgment, and I must candidly admit that they have not had those years of trial which the cautious cultivator can rely on. They were not practiced by my great grandfather, my grandfather, nor even my own progenitor. I can only say they appear to do well with me.

I grow no trees in my nursery for sale. I plant them all. I have no confidence in what is called the whole root seeding stock theory. All thrifty growing trees I prefer, decidedly, upon their own roots. This, in the apple, I accomplished principally by common root grafting and setting the trees well in the ground, by which the grafts generally take root. An observation of thousands of trees has satisfied me that those trees growing on their own roots are longer lived than those grafted standard high, and longer lived and more thrifty than most seedlings. One seedling out of four may be found very vigorous and healthy.

Pears I grow chiefly on healthy sprouts that are easily transplanted, bud freely, and layer readily. In these, at the usual season, I insert from one to a dozen buds, according to the size and vigor of the stalk. These buds are inserted on the same side, one above the other, about five inches apart. At the proper season the stock it trimmed of all limbs and buds but those inserted, and topped, and then weakened by a cut at the same side the buds are set, and is brought over rather more than half to the ground. Here it remains until the shoots are from three to six inches long. Then a trench is dug three inches deep, and the stock is lipped just below each bud, and then brought into the little ditch and fastened there as a layer. If the weather is hot, a little fine leafy brush is put around them. After a few days, when the trees have become accustomed to their new position, I draw in a little fine dirt, which I continue from time to time until they are well rooted. This gives the tree its choice between its own root and the root of the other on which it is budded. Nine out of ten will show preference in the end for their own roots, though a free growing stocking will generally root first. I will make no argument in favor of this mode of growing trees. I am aware many learned professors call all such worthless trash. I may only say I have seen some of the oldest worn out varieties, of great age, growing on their own roots, with the seeming health and vigor of youth, and that I am quite willing to risk the planting of considerable numbers of them.

When I have once got a good stock of a variety, I can of course dispense with my sprout stocks and grow them directly as layers. Most kinds root without great trouble and grow well. I will only add that I prefer all healthy, vigorous trees on their own roots. I know no tree which I should deem profitable to set out in an orchard which I would not prefer on its own roots. Even the Early Harvest and Sweet Bough prosper well with me on their own roots. But most of my pear trees of this class are yet small.

In trimming trees in the nursery, and when set out, my latter practice in quite odd. It is very offensive to the great majority of opinions. I endeavor to grow no nice, pretty, clean, smooth stems, six or seven feet high, that would make a good ramrod. Some, indeed, I run up pretty well, but I rub no buds off, and only pinch the shoots when they have three or four leaves, so that each stock be-becomes a mass of verdure. As I have practiced this mode only a few years, I can only say it seems to me to promise well. I have not practiced it to an extent which would enable me to give any opinion based on observation, but it is my confident conviction that there can be nothing better to start standard pears on than the quince stock. We know they start vigorously, and also that, if the pear stock is set well under the ground when it is transplanted, it will root freely. Why should not such make the very best standard orchard trees? I have no doubt they will.

It seems to me that in this way we might secure early maturity in bearing and in the end the largest and longest lived trees. Indeed, there seems reason to hope they might be even more likely to live than in any other way. A moderate and sound growth is indispensable in the young pear tree to its health and vigor in mature age. This is secured by first working on the quince; and it is certain that whenever the quince fails to give the pear stock the requisite nourishment, it will root if it is favorably situated. It is as natural as for a man to eat when he is hungry, if food is at hand. [The Agriculturist.

Hints on Stabling Horses and Cattle.

In all the arrangements for constructing and keeping stables in order, the comfort, and consequently the health and thrift of the animal should be kept constantly in view. Some farmers, well satisfied with the importance of pure air, think it sufficient to open a stable window or door occasionally, for this purpose. This usually throws in a strong, cold current againt the animals' feet, the warmer and fouler air remaining, by its less specific gravity, in the upper part of the stable, and unreached by the fresh current. A wooden tube running up like a small chimney from the upper part, in which the current may be according to the coldness or windiness of the weather, by a wooden valve, is far better.

Cleanliness under foot is another ingredient to the comfort of animals. This can be secured only by a good stone or plank floor, very frequent cleanings, and a sufficiency, not superabundance, of clean dry litter. Remember, it is about as easy to throw out a cart-load of fresh droppings, in fifty different operations, performed twice a day, as to do it once a week, at one formidable and disagreeable task. A stable clean under foot, is absolutely essential to pure air.

Many horses should never be stabled in one apartment, or in adjoining stalls, under one roof. For, if one becomes affected with disease, especially if a contagious one, the others in all probability will receive it. One horse getting loose, will disturb the rest; or, if one becomes restless from any sudden attack, the noise deprives the others of their regular repose, and renders them also more liable to an attack. It is said that a marked difference in the amount of labor performed by a set of horses has been observed after a night of disturbed repose from a single affected animal. Every farm should be provided with at least one "loose box," (or room for turning in loose) for any animal that may become diseased.

Sometimes the difficulty of access to litter prevents a proper attention to the comfort of stables. It may happen to be stowed away in some remote corner of the barn, or still worse or more common, out of doors, covered with snow or drenched with rain, and rendered in a great measure unfit for its intended purpose. The straw of threshed grain cannot be deposited in too convenient a position. A good arrangement is to place the "straw barn" between the grain barn and the stables, and partly over the latter.

Stables are commonly made too small. Many of the stalls made for horses are not over twelve feet in length, including the manger or feeding-box. Eighteen feet would be much better. The partitions should be of strong and solid timber, and sufficiently high and tight to prevent their seeing or smelling each other—the usual preliminary to kicking. Boxes should be ten feet square.

Cattle, that are stabled in winter, are more apt to be neglected in cleanliness than horses. It seems revolting, that the animal from which we derive so much of the supplies for the table—butter, cheese, milk, and cream, should be compelled to lie on foul beds and breathe a foul atmosphere. Such causes must of necessity injure the quality, and lessen the quantity of these products, at the same time that the animals suffer in condition. Clean dry beds, from very frequent cleaning and attention, and a good wholesome air, would certainly contribute much to the comfort of the animal, and still more, we should think, to the comfort of the owner and attendant, if they have any appreciation of the elements of comfort and enjoyment.

Water-Cure of Founder in Horses.

Having had a little experience in curing the founder in horses, I take this method to give you a fact, that you may give it to others through the columns of your journal. It may be of great service to some, and save many a fine horse from premature death and much suffering.

The fact I shall give you is of a horse worth three hundred dollars because of his fleetness. He came to my hand in August, about eight o'clock in the evening, after being driven only twenty-nine miles with only two persons in a very light and easy buggy. The horse for some time had been fed all the grain he would eat. For two or three days he had not liked his grain, but the night before he came to my hand, he had eaten to the full of all he had liked; and when he came he was so stiff he could not step over a six inch pole, and when he attempted to turn round, would nearly fall.

I put him into water nearly knee deep, and kept a wet blanket on him all the time for four hours; then put him into the stable, and put another blanket over him and left him for the night. The next morning I found him sweating; took him from the stable and rode him a mile; led him back, and put him in the brook again for an hour. During the day I exercised him about five miles, and about sunset let him stand an hour in the water, and again the next morning.

About nine o'clock he was started on his journey of forty-two miles, and performed it with ease before sunset; he laid over one day and went back the next, forty-five miles, and was returned to his owner, who being a farrier, sold him in a few days, perfectly unable to describe any difficulty or damage done to his horse, being ignorant of what had happened. The horse was allowed all the food and water he wanted as usual. He was not bled in any part, neither was there any thing given to him except his usual food. The second day he was as limber as he ever was, and has shown no injury from his founder since.

Trade with China.

The following interesting explanation of the manner of conducting trade with the Chinese nation is made in Dr. Allen's recent publication upon the opium traffic:—

"William Sturgis, Esq., of Boston, whose experience in the China trade, though not in opium, extends back more than half a century, in a lecture delivered not long since before the Boston Mercantile Library Association, stated that in 1848, $7,000,000 in specie was carried from the United States to China to pay for our importations from that country; but now most all our purchasers are paid by bills of exchange on England, from the proceeds of the opium trade. This fact may serve to explain the manner in which trade is carried on with China. Formerly, the exports of that nation were greater than the imports. From 1800 to 1830, European nations and the United States were obliged to ship every year large quantities of specie to China, in payment for silk, tea, and other merchandise.

"But the opium trade, taking the place of all useful articles of manufacture, or of any other production, increased to such an extent, that soon after 1830 the balance of trade was turned against China. Consequently the balance of trade in the regular exchange of commodities, must be paid in specie, and is just so much drain on the bullion of China. Dr. Williams states that from 1835 to 1850, it averaged yearly more than $15,000,000, which would amount in this period to $200,000,000. It is true, however, that all the opium sold in China, amounting to more than $40,000,000 annually, is paid for in specie, but then only about one-third of it actually leaves that country. The balance is taken to brokers at Canton or Hong-Kong, and is converted into what are termed "bills of exchange," which are used in China by merchants in payment for teas, silks, and other commodities. These bills of exchange are frequently brought to India, and also to England, and are used in London, Liverpool, and other cities in the way of trade to China."

Suffering and Endurance.

A melancholy case of suffering and great endurance occurred in the Lake Superior country, about the middle of December last. Three Germans, who had been in he employ of the Salt Ship Canal Company, on Drummond Island, as quarry-men, took a Sunday excursion into the woods and got lost. Not returning, after a lapse of about two days, the other quarrymen went to search for them, but every search was ineffectual. Days passed, and nothing was heard of them. In the meantime all the quarrymen left for the winter, and all hope of the missing Germans was abandoned, every one considering them dead.

At the end of two weeks, of unusually stormy weather, from the day they were first missed, a Mr. Warner, being nearly the only person who remained to winter on the island, observed, at the opposite side of the river from where he resided, a fire in the woods, and some men near it. It immediately occurred to him that they might possibly be the persons lost from the quarries, and on sending a boat for them, he found they were none other than two of the men who had been lost two weeks previously, and more haggard, tattered, miserable, suffering looking objects were perhaps never seen before. They were living skeletons, bruised and torn and famished to the last degree; so much exhausted and worn out that they could barely stand, and could scarcely talk. Their clothes were nearly all gone, and their limbs were frozen and bare.

Fifteen days they had wandered about the island, with no other food than one partridge and a few beech-nuts they picked up in their wanderings. They had a gun with them and powder, but lost their percussion caps soon after they went into the woods, and were thus left without the least means of support, except beech-nuts and a partridge killed by a stick. They at last made the fire, that was the means of saving their lives, with a stone, which they found on the beach, and a knife. It appears from the account they give, that they soon lost their way in endeavoring to return to the quarries, and wandered for several days without coming to the water. On the eighth day their comrade left them and undertook to find his way back alone, and was not seen afterward, and he has undoubtedly perished with hunger and cold. The two who were rescued were well taken care of, and are expected to recover.

THE PRICE AND PROFITS OF NEWSPAPERS.—Under this head the New England Farmer has the following:—

In the case of weekly papers, the margin for profit is even smaller than the dailies. The advertising patronage, so essential to the very existence of the daily, is a small item in the receipts of the weekly paper. The subscribers of the latter, moreover, are scattered throughout the country, which entails upon the publisher great losses, and heavy expenses for collecting dues. We do not believe there is a single weekly newspaper establishment in Boston which a jury of business men would pronounce a money-making concern. At present prices, a fair living is all that can be expected—and probably half the weekly newspapers of this city do not afford even this to their publishers.

We are aware that there is a class of weekly papers, made up entirely from matter previously published in daily papers, which are afforded to clubs at prices lower than our own. We would detract nothing from the value of these publications, but it should be remembered that their contents are entirely second-hand, and the expenses attending their publication are comparatively small, no outlay being required for editing, correspondence, or type-setting. It is manifestly unjust to take these papers as a standard by which the prices of journals like our own should be regulated.

"Are you a Christian Indian?" said a person to an adherent of Red Jacket, at the settlement near Cattaraugus. "No," said the sturdy savage, "I Whisky Indian." He could see that whisky drinking and Christianity had little in common, and was honest enough to classify himself according to his habits. Not a few of our civilized "Whisky Indians" lack the honesty or discrimination of the savage.

VARIETY.

About a hundred years ago, a Scotch gentleman bequeathed to his "poor relations, of whatever degree," the sum of £20,000. In effect, he left them a Chancery suit, which has remained in the family ever since. In the first place, the next of kin disputed the validity of the bequest, but it was established by Lord Chancellor Camden, and 463 persons made out their relationship. Thereupon, in the year 1766, a bill was filed for the distribution of the money amongst them, which has not been effected to this day.

At the "fish manufactory," as it is called, at Huninguen—the establishment for producing fish on the artificial system—there are now 200,000 eggs of the Rhine salmon, and of the large trout of the Swiss lakes, duly fecundated; and there are 100,000 of the same description of eggs, also fecundated at the College de France, in Paris. These eggs are destined for distribution amongst the departments in which money has been voted for the application of the artificial system.

A Mr. Swift, of Dublin, has an invention by which he can progress through the water in an upright position at the rate of five miles an hour. The apparatus consists of two air-tight tin floats of twenty feet long, tapering to a narrow point at each end, and joined together by two bars of iron. The mode by which it is propelled, is by a double-bladed oar, 18 feet in length, which is made to ply windmill fashion by the occupant, who stands in the center.

The following anecdote is told of a celebrated clergyman of Albany. He told his parishioners he should reserve the best efforts of his mind for rainy days—and the worse the weather, the better should be his sermons—and he kept his word. The consequence naturally was, that his church was never so well filled as in wet weather, and the harder the rain poured down, the more the people flocked in.

Capt. McClure, while making the "North-West Passage," had an interview at Point Warren, with a tribe of Arctic Indians, the Chief of whom being asked why he went a great distance to trade with the Esquimaux, instead of trading with the posts on Mackenzie's river, said the reason was that the white men there had given the Indians very bad water, which killed many, and made others foolish, and that they would not have any such water.

Genius without judgment, or judgment without genius, only makes half a character; it is the combination of genius to create, with the judgment to control, that forms the truly great man. Charles XII. was a specimen of genius without judgment; Wellington, judgment without genius, whilst Napoleon was a magnificent instance of the two combined.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Friday, Jan. 20, 1854, says, Judah Touro, well known for his benevolence, died in this city on Wednesday night. His fortune is estimated at a million and a half of dollars, and it is reported that the bulk of it is bequeathed to the public institutions of New Orleans.

The highest estimate we have of the yearly revenue of Russia is £28,000,000, the lowest is £16,000,000. Mr. McGregor, in his Commercial Statistics, makes it two millions less, or £18,262,718. Mr. McCullock says it is £15,847,000. Sir Archibald Allison states it to be £20,000,000.

The hog killing season has closed at Louisville. The Journal gives us the total—407,033 killed this season. The average weight of 105,412 of these was 215 4-10 lbs. The average weight of 72,041, was 208⅓ lbs. The number packed this season at that place exceeds last year upward of 100,000.

GERRIT SMITH ON WAR.

Speech delivered in the House of Representatives, Jan. 18, 1854, on the bill making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1855. In delivering this Speech, Mr. Smith was twice interrupted with points of order, raised by those who did not like his doctrines. The places of those interruptions are indicated by asterisks.

I believe, Sir, in the progress of the human race. I delight to dwell upon the idea of an evergrowing civilization. Hence it is, that I am afflicted at every demonstration of the war spirit. For the spirit of war, is the spirit of barbarism; and, notwithstanding the general impression to the contrary, war is the mightiest of all the hinderances to the progress of civilization. But the spirit of this bill is the dark, barbarous, baleful spirit of war; and, therefore, would I use all honorable means to defeat the bill.

It is strange—it is sad—that, in a nation, professing faith in the Prince of Peace, the war spirit should be so rampant. That, in such a nation, there should be any manifestation whatever of this spirit, is grossly inconsistent.

"My voice is still for war," are words ascribed to a celebrated Roman. But, as he was a pagan, and lived more than two thousand years ago, it is not strange, that he was for war. But, that we, who have a more than two thousand years longer retrospect of the horrors of war than he had—that we, who, instead of but a pagan sense of right and wrong, have, or, at least, have the means of having, a Christian sense of right and wrong—that we should be for war, is, indeed, passing strange.

How vast, incomprehensibly vast, the loss of life by war! There are various estimates of this loss. * * * * *

Burke's estimate, if my recollection is right. is, that thirty-five thousand millions of persons have perished by war; that is, some thirty-five times as many as the whole present population of the earth. In Bible language: "Who slew all these?" War slew them. And, when contemplating this vast slaughter, how natural to inquire, in other words of that blessed book, "Shall the sword devour forever?"

And how immense the loss of property by war! The annual cost of the war system to Europe alone, including interest on her war debt, exceeds a thousand millions of dollars. The Government of our own nation has expended, on account of the army and fortifications, more than five hundred millions of dollars; and, on account of the navy and its operations, more than half that sum. But to ascertain the whole loss of property, which this nation has suffered by war, we must take into the reckoning many other items; and, especially, the cost of the militia. Now, this last item, not according to mere conjecture, but according to the computation of those capable of making it, is fifteen hundred millions of dollars. Add, then to what our nation has paid for war, and to her loss of property by war, the interest on these payments and losses, and you have an aggregate equaling a large share of the whole present wealth of the nation.

And, just here, Sir, I would say a few words of national debts. As such debts are, in the main, war debts, there can be no assignable limit to their accumulation, so long as war is thought to be necessary—for, so long, there will be wars—and, until war is abandoned, it will be held to be unjust and dishonorable to repudiate war debts, no matter how crushing, and increasingly crushing, from age to age, may be the burden of such debts. So commanding is the influence of war, and so world-wide and mighty the sentiment, which it has been able to create in favor of itself, that no debts are deemed more sacred and obligatory, than war debts. And yet, so far from such debts being, in truth, sacred and obligatory, there is the most urgent and imperative duty to repudiate them. No doctrine should be more indignantly scouted than the doctrine, that one generation may anticipate and waste the earnings and wealth of another generation. Nothing is plainer than that the great impartial Father of us all would have every generation enter upon its course, unmortgaged and unloaded by prior generations. Nothing is plainer than that in those States of Europe, where the war debt is so great, that the very life blood of the masses must be squeezed out to pay the annual interest upon it, repudiation must take place, ere those masses can rise into even a tolerable existence. It is a very common remark, at the present time, that Europe needs a revolution. She does need a revolution. But she needs repudiation more. However, there never will be a decided and wholesome revolution in Europe, that does not involve repudiation. If a people, on whom the wars and crimes of past generations have entailed an overwhelming burden of debt, shall achieve a revolution, of which repudiation is not a part, their labor and sacrifice will be lost—their revolution will be spurious and vain. To say, that the people of England and Holland, where the war debt is so great, as to make the average share of each one of them, both children and adults, between two and three hundred dollars— * * * *

It is absurd to claim, that the people of England and Holland are morally bound to continue to dig from the earth, and to produce by other forms of toil, the means for paying the interest on their enormous war debt. They are morally bound to refuse to pay both interest and principal. They are morally bound to break loose from this load, and to drag it no longer. For, so long as they drag it, they cannot exercise the rights of manhood, nor enjoy the blessings, nor fulfill the high purposes, of human existence. Is it said, that the Government, for whose wars they are now paying, would have been overthrown, but for these wars? I answer, that the Government, which involved its subjects in those wars, was the greatest curse of those subjects, and is the greatest curse of their successors. The maintenance of such a Government is loss. Its overthrow is gain.

I do not deny, that the case is possible, in which a generation would be morally bound to assume the debt created by its predecessor. But, even then, such generation should be the sole judge of its obligation to assume the debt. Were the cholera raging over the whole length and breadth of our land, and sweeping off millions of our people; and were a foreign nation to minister to our relief by lending us money; if we could not repay the loan, our successors should: and such a loan they would be glad to repay.

I would incidentally remark, that Civil Government will be neither honest nor frugal, so long as the practice of war is continued. I say so, for the reason, that the extensive means necessary to carry on wars, or pay war debts, cannot be obtained by direct taxation. The people will consent to their being obtained only by indirect taxation: and no Government ever was, or ever will be, either honest or frugal, whose expenses are defrayed by indirect taxation; for no Government, whose expenses are thus defrayed, ever was, or ever will be, held to a strict responsibility by the people: and no Government, not held to such responsibility, ever was, or ever will be, either honest or frugal.

I have referred to the loss of life and property by war—of life that is so precious—of property, that is so indispensable to the enjoyment and usefulness of life. But there is an unspeakably greater loss than this, with which war is also chargeable. I refer to the damage, which morals and religion suffer from it. All I need add on this point is, that the power of war to demoralize the world, and to corrupt the purest religion in the world, is abundantly manifest in the fact, that the moral and religious sense of even good men is not shocked by war. No stronger argument can be brought against war than the fact of its power to conform the morals and religion of the world to war.

It would, perhaps, be wrong to ascribe the continuance of war to the low and perverted state of the moral and religious sense. It would, perhaps, be more proper to ascribe it to the prevailing delusion, that war is unavoidable. And yet it may be, that a better state of the moral and religious sense would have entirely prevented this delusion. But, however this delusion may be accounted for, or whatever may be responsible for it, it is consoling to know, that it is not so well nigh impossible to dispel it, as is generally supposed. A fresh baptism of wisdom and goodness may, perhaps, be needed to that end; but no new faculties, and not a new birth. Nay, were we to apply to the subject of war no more than our present stock of good sense and good feeling—no more than our mental and moral faculties, as they now are—it is probable, that war could not long withstand the application.

The doctrine, that war is a necessity, is the greatest of all libels on man. The confidence, which, in private life, we manifest in each other, proves that it is such a libel. We walk the streets unarmed. We go to bed without fear, and with unlocked doors: and we thus prove, that we regard our fellow-men as our friends, and not our foes—as disposed to protect, and not to harm us. It is true, that there is, here and there, one that would rob us; and, at very far wider intervals, one that would kill us. But we are at rest in the consciousness, that, where there is one to assail us, there are a hundred to defend us. Indeed, society could not be held together were it not true, that the generality of men are swayed by love, and confidence, and generosity, existing either in their own hearts, or accorded by them to others. The men, who are swayed by distrust and hatred, constitute the exceptional cases.

Have I, then, an evil-minded neighbor? I, nevertheless, need not fight with him. I may rely under God, upon the mass of my neighbors to protect me against him. So, too, if there is, here and there, a malicious American, and, here and there, a malicious Englishman, who would be guilty of involving their countries in a war with each other; nevertheless, the Americans and Englishmen, inasmuch as they prefer international amity to international quarrels, should be relied on. Now, it is in this point of view, that the nation, which is determined to keep out of war, will never find itself involved in war; and that nothing is hazarded by adopting the peace policy. I add, that, as it is not in human nature, under its ordinary influences, and in its ordinary circumstances, to fall upon an unarmed and unresisting man, so the nation, which puts its trust, not in weapons of war, but in the fraternal affections of the human heart, and in the God, who planted those affections there, will find this trust an effectual shield from the horrors of war. Such a shield did the good men, who founded Pennsylvania, find this trust. During the seventy years of this trust, there was no blood shed in their Province. These good men subdued even the savage heart, simply by trusting that heart. These good men, by refusing to carry deadly weapons themselves, shamed even savages out of carrying them. And were America, now, to disarm herself, even to the extent of abandoning the policy and practice of war, and were she to cast herself for protection on the world's heart, she would find that heart worthy of being so trusted. The other nations of the earth would not only be ashamed to take advantage of her disarmament, but they would love their confiding sister too well to do so. Nay, more. Instead of making her exposed condition an occasion for their malevolence, they would be moved to reciprocate the confidence expressed by that condition, and to disarm themselves.

I have already admitted, that there are persons who would wrong us—who would even plunder and kill us. I now admit, that Government is bound to provide against them. If, on the one hand, I protest against stamping the masses with the desperate character of these rare individuals, on the other, I admit, that we are to guard against these rare individuals. But to argue, that, because of the existence of these rare individuals in France, or England, or any other nation, the nation itself is necessarily disposed to make war upon us, is to make the exceptions to the rule, instead of the rule itself, the basis of the argument.

Whilst, for the reason, that I believe, that there is no need of war, I believe there is no need of making preparation against it, I nevertheless admit, that there is need of Government, of prisons, and of an armed police. Whilst I hold that a nation, whose Government is just, in all its dealings with its own subjects, and with foreigners, and which so far confides in, and honors human nature, as to trust, that even nations are capable of the reciprocations of justice—aye, and the reciprocations of love, also—I say, whilst I hold, that such a nation needs to make no provision against war, I still admit that it is bound, in common with every other nation, to have ever in readiness, both on sea and land, a considerable armed force, to be wielded, as occasions may require, against the hostes humani generis—the enemies of the human race—the pirates, that, both on land and sea, "lurk privily for the innocent prey."

But what shall be the character—the intellectual and moral character—of the men proper to compose this armed force? No other question in this discussion is so important; and, perhaps, in the whole range of earthly interests, there is not a more important question. The answer which I shall give to this question is a very novel one: so novel, indeed, that, were I not irresistibly impressed with its truth and value, I should not venture to give it.

The punishment of its own offending citizens is, confessedly, regarded as being, in all its stages, a most solemn and responsible duty. Laws to this end are enacted with considerateness and solemnity. It is claimed, that none but wise and just men are fitted to enact them. Judges and jurors are considerate and solemn in applying the laws; and none but the upright and intelligent are allowed to be suitable persons for judges and jurors. All this is indispensable to maintain the moral influence and the majesty of the laws. But how fatally would this majesty be dishonored, and this moral influence be broken, if all this propriety and all this consistency were then to be followed up with the gross impropriety and gross inconsistency of committing the execution of the verdict, or decree, of the court-room to the hands of the profligate and base. Most clear is it, that the turnkey and hangman should not fall below the lawmaker or judge, in dignity and excellence of character. I am aware, that it was once thought, that the vilest man in the community was the most approprite man for hangman. But sounder thinking requires that the hangman, if there must be a hangman, should be one of the noblest and holiest of men.

Such is my argument—and, I trust, it is a conclusive one—in favor of a solemn and dignified execution of the laws of Government against its offending subjects. But cannot a similar, and a no less conclusive argument be made in favor of such an execution of its laws against foreign offenders, also? Most certainly. It is admitted, that the greatest wisdom and considerateness are necessary in deciding on so solemn a measure as war. But, just here, the amazing impropriety, the fatal inconsistency, occurs of intrusting the execution of the declaration of war to those, who are, for the most part, profligate and base—the very scum and refuse of society. Not only so, but it is insisted, and that too by good men, and by the friends of peace, that the profligate and base are the peculiarly fit persons to fill up the ranks of the armies—the peculiarly fit persons to be "food for powder." They believe, with Napoleon, that "the worse the man, the better the soldier;" and with Wellington, that "the men who have nice scruples about religion, have no business to be soldiers." A sad mistake, however, is this, on the part of the good men I have referred to. They should insist, that none but the virtuous and intelligent are fit to be armed men. Peace men are wont to complain, that war is too much honored. But if there must be war, it should be far more honored than it is; and, to have it so, none but the intelligent and virtuous are to be thought worthy of fighting its battles. Of such persons, and of such only, would I have the national police consist; that police, which is the fit and needed substitute for war armies and war-navies. Surely, they who man the vessel that is to go forth against the pirates of the ocean, and they who take up arms to vindicate defied justice on the land, should be men of virtue, and not vice—intelligent and not ignorant. The wicked and the vile will not fail to justify their wickedness, if it is the wicked and the vile who undertake their punishment. But if wisdom and virtue are arrayed against them, there is hope that they may be awed or shamed out of their wickedness.

The armed forces of the world are looked upon as a mere brute power. Composed, as I would have them composed, there would still be an ample amount of brute power in them; but there would, also, be in them the far more important element of moral power. I say far more important; for disturbers of the peace, and trangressors of the laws, would be far more controlled by the presence of the moral, than the presence of the brute power. Indeed, the brute power itself would then be viewed very differently from what it now is. Now, it kindles the wrath, and, oftentimes, the contempt of those against whom it is arrayed. But, then, commended, honored, sanctified by the moral influence, with which it would stand associated, it would be respected, and submitted to, by many, who, but for that association, would despise and resist it. That men of conscience and virtue are respected and feared by their enemies; and that their conscience and virtue make their hearts none the less courageous and their arms none the less strong; was well illustrated by Cromwell's never-defeated armies.

With my conceptions of the character proper for those, who are to compose the armed police of a nation, it is not strange, that I, too, would be in favor of military and naval schools; and that I would have them far more numerously attended than such schools now are. But the military and naval schools, that I would be in favor of, would not be an appendage of the war system. They would not look to the possibility of war: and, of course, they would not train their pupils for war. Nevertheless, they would train them for the most effective service against the enemies of the human race; and to this end they would impart the highest scientific, literary, and moral education.

I said, that I would have none, but the virtuous and intelligent, for the armed men of the nation. They should be gentlemen: and, all the better, if Christians and scholars also. They should be among the most honored of men—both from their high office, as conservators of the public safety, and from their intrinsic merits. But, alas, what a contrast between such men and the vast majority of those, who compose the armies of the world! To that vast majority Government gives out grog, as swill is given out to hogs. From the backs of that vast majority many statesmen are reluctant to hold back the lash. Of course, I refer not to mere "sentimentalists," but to those intellectual persons, who, in the esteem of the gentleman of Alabama, are alone capable of rising "into the dignity of statesmen."

We, often, hear it said, that the policeman of London is a gentleman. He should be. But if he, who is charged with the preservation of the peace, and safety, and order of a city, needs to be a gentleman, how much more should he be a gentleman, whose office is to care, in this wise, for a nation and for the world!

But, it will be said, that men of the elevated character with which I would fill up our armed forces, would not be content with the present wages of the common sailor and common soldier. It is true, that they would not; and, that they should not. Their wages should be several times greater. But, it must be remembered, on the other hand, that one of such men would be worth fifty of the present kind of armed men for preserving the world's peace. Nay, the armed men of the world are of a kind continually to hazard the peace of the world.

I said, that there is no need of preparing against war. I add, that preparation against war provokes to it, instead of preventing it. If England makes it, then is France provoked to a counter preparation. And, what is not less, but much more, each nation, having made such preparation, is tempted to use it. If these nations line their respective coasts with cannon, it is but natural, that they should long to try the efficiency of their cannon on each other's ships. "To what purpose is all this waste?" will be the reproachful inquiry, which they will put to themselves, whilst they suffer this vastly expensive preparation to lie idle. If the maxim: "To prepare for war is to prevent war," were ever true, it must have been in those remote ages, when such preparation cost but little time and money. It, certainly, is not true, when much time and scores of millions are expended in such preparation.

But, to return to the bill. I would, that it might be defeated; and that the bill for building vessels-of-war might be defeated; and that the President's recommendations for increasing the army and navy might find no favor. For the legitimate purposes of a national armed police, the army and navy are already sufficiently large. What is lacking in them is an elevation of intellectual and moral character; and how to supply that lack I have already indicated.

But, it is asked: "What shall we do with the surplus money in the Treasury?" I answer: "Use it in paying our debts." We owe many honest debts—and some of them to persons, who are suffering for the payment of them. We shall be, altogether, without excuse, if, when our Treasury is overflowing, we do not pay them; but, instead thereof, indulge a mad war passion in building ships, and in making other war preparations. Remember, too, that the debt, which we incurred in our superlatively mean and wicked war with Mexico is not all paid. I hope, that we shall pay it; and not leave it to posterity to be obliged to pay it, or repudiate it. But it may also be asked: "What shall we do with the future surplus money in the Treasury?" I answer: "Have none." We should have none, either by adopting free trade, or by doing what is the next best thing—raising the tariff to the level of a full protection. The mixture of free trade and protection is a miserable compound. But it may also be asked: "What shall we then do for means to carry on the Government?" I answer, that, when we shall no longer have war to support, and are weaned from the extravagances and follies, which are cherished and begotten by that dazzling and bewitching and befooling barbarism, it will not cost more than one tenth as much as it now does, to defray the cost of administering Government; and that tenth the people will be willing to be directly taxed for.

But I have consumed the most of my hour, and must close. Do not pass any of these war bills. Do not so cruel, so foolish, so wicked a thing. Cruel it will be to the poor, who will have to pay these millions of fresh taxes; for, remember, Sir, that it is they, who have to pay them. The toiling poor are the only creators of wealth. Such as ourselves, are but the conduits of wealth. Foolish it will be, because the more you expend in this wise, the more will it be felt necessary to expend; and because the more you seek to protect your country in this wise, the less will she be protected. Wicked it will be, because war, in all its phases, is one of the most horrid crimes against God and man.

I have made my appeals, Sir, in the name of reason and religion, both of which condemn war. Let not these appeals, which are made to our higher nature—to all, that is pure, and holy, and sublime within us—be overborne by the counter appeals, which are made in the name of a vulgar patriotism, and which are all addressed to our lower nature—to our passion, pride, and prejudice—our love of conquest, and power, and plunder.

There is, just now, an opportunity for Congress to do a better thing than to indulge and foment the spirit of war. Our Government, as I am informed, is negotiating a commercial treaty with England. From what I learn of its provisions, I rejoice in it. I trust, that it will be consummated, and go into full effect. It will well dispose of the fishery difficulties. It will open to us reciprocal free trade, in natural productions, with the British North American Provinces; and so lead the way for our reciprocal free trade with those Provinces in all productions—in the works of men's hands, as well as in the fruits of God's earth; and so lead the way, I may add, for such unrestricted trade between ourselves and other countries also. I regret that our Government has, hitherto, been so slow to embrace the liberal overtures of our northern neighbors. I trust that no sectional or other unworthy jealousies will avail to hold us back any longer, from embracing these overtures. Let not Maine fear a new competition in lumber and ship-building; nor Pennsylvania in coal; nor Ohio in wheat. These States will lose nothing in these respects; and if they should lose anything, their loss will be inconsiderable, in comparison with their rich gain from free trade in natural productions with a country whose trade with us has doubled in the last seven years, and our exports to which are double her exports to us. Her trade with us in 1852 amounted to nearly seventeen millions of dollars. And let not the unworthy cavil be repeated, that these Provinces offer us free trade in natural productions only. How could they carry on their Governments, were they to consent to free trade in all productions? Is it said, that they could by direct taxation? But it does not lie in the mouth of a Tariff nation like ours to say so. I repeat it—I rejoice in this treaty. To accomplish such a blessing for our own country, for the British Provinces, and for the world, will be an imperishable honor to this Administration.

I am informed that our Government is negotiating a commercial treaty with France also. Now, how happy if this House would use its great influence to get inserted in both these treaties an arbitration clause—a clause submitting international disagreements to a wise, disinterested, peaceful arbitrament! How happy if this House would pass a resolution to this effect! An arbitration clause in our treaties with those nations would render war between them and us well nigh morally impossible. And such a clause would prepare the way for the establishment of an international court—that great desiratum of the world. Would that our country might participate most promptly and most largely in the glory of achieving that desideratum! We have already, the village court, and the county court, and the district court, and the state court, and the national court: and were it proposed to abolish one of these courts, and to let differences between men take their own course, and run into violence and bloodshed, such proposition would be regarded as a proposition to return to barbarism. But, sir, I trust that the day is near at hand, when it will be thought to be barbarous not to have an international court.

Sir, I have done. Rapidly, very rapidly, has the world advanced in civilization the last forty years. The great reason why it has is, that, during this period, it has been comparatively exempt from the curse of war. Let the world continue to advance thus rapidly in civilization; and let our nation continue to advance with it. During these forty years our nation has generally gone forward in the cause of peace. In its war with Mexico, it took a wide step backward. God grant that it may never take another step backward in this cause! God grant that, in respect to this dear and sacred cause, our nation may adopt the motto on one side of the standard of the immortal Hampden: "Nulla vestigia retrorsum"—no steps backward: and, having done this, it will have good ground to hope for its realization of the blessing of the motto on the other side of that patriot's standard: "God with us."

Pass these war bills, Sir, and carry out the President's recommendations, and you will contribute to roll along that deep and broad stream of sin and sorrow, which war has rolled down through every age of the world. But defeat these bills, and frown upon these recommendations, and there will be joy on earth, and joy in heaven.

THE LOST SON.

I was standing by the side of my mother, under the spacious porch of Dr. Beatty's church, Union-street, Glasgow, awaiting the hour for afternoon service. A holy calm hung over the city; no discordant noise broke the solemn stillness of the day of rest and worship; scarcely a whisper was heard in the assembly of waiting worshipers who crowded the broad pavement on which I stood. All seemed profoundly impressed with the solemn and sacred character of the day, the place, and the occasion which had called them together. It was, in short, a Sunday in the land of Knox and Chambers. I had been in this position probably ten or fifteen minutes, when I observed two young men turn a corner and walk toward the church. They were dressed in their working clothes, unshaven and dirty, and slightly intoxicated. As they passed the church-door, they assumed a swaggering, irreverent gait, laughed, and finally commenced singing a profane song. Some of the bystanders expressed their horror at the occurrence, others wondered what had become of the police; but my mother turned to me, and said, "Follow those two men, and invite them to a seat in our pew."

I soon overtook them and delivered my mother's message. One laughed scornfully and began to swear; the other paused and pondered, and was evidently struck with the nature of the invitation. His companion again swore, and was about to drag him away. But he still paused. I repeated the invitation, and in a few seconds he looked in my face and said, "When I was a boy like you, I went to church every Sunday. I have not been inside of a church for three years. I don't feel right. I believe I will go with you." I seized his hand and led him back to the house of God, in spite of the remonstrances and oaths of his companion. The doors were now open, and the church was filling rapidly; we entered, and I conducted him to the pew where my mother was already seated. A most excellent sermon was preached from Eccles. xi. 1—"Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days." The young man was attentive, but seemed abashed.

At the conclusion of the service he hastened out of the church, but he was closely followed, and soon overtaken, by my mother, who kindly said to him, "Have you a Bible, young man?" "No, ma'am; but I can get one," was his reply. "Well, take my son's Bible till you can procure one of your own. Read it attentively during the week, and come to meeting again next Sunday. I will always be happy to accommodate you with a seat."

He put the Bible in his pocket and hurried away. At family worship that evening my mother prayed fervently for the conversion of that young man.

Next Sunday came, and the next, but the stranger did not appear. My mother frequently spoke of him, and appeared grieved at his absence. He had doubtless been the subject of her closet devotions. On the third Sabbath morning, while the congregation were singing the first psalm, the young man again entered the pew. He was now dressed genteelly, and appeared thin and pale, as if from recent sickness. My mother looked at him with great earnestness, and a gleam of satisfaction and thankfulness overspread her pale, intellectual features. Immediately after the benediction, the stranger laid down my Bible, and left the house without giving my mother an opportunity she much desired, of conversing with him. On one of the blank leaves of the Bible we found some writing in pencil, signed "W. C." The writer stated that he had been confined to his room by sickness for the previous two weeks. He declared his inability to express his gratitude to my mother for the interest she had manifested in his spiritual welfare; he asked to be remembered in her prayers, and concluded by stating that he was an Englishman, and would return to his native land in about ten days.

Years rolled on; my mother passed to her heavenly rest; I grew up to manhood, and the stranger was forgotten.

In the autumn of 18—, the ship St. George, of which I was the medical officer, anchored in Table Bay. Between us and Penguin Island, I observed a man-of-war, which I had seen before, and knew well; it was her majesty's brig Chanticleer, of ten guns, Commander Forbes, on a surveying expedition. The surgeon of the brig, Dr. F——, had been my perceptor, and I resolved to pay him a visit. After dining with the gun-room officers, he proposed that on the following day, which was Sunday, we should attend meeting in Capetown. "It will remind us," he said, "of old times, when we used to go arm in arm to church in Union street."

Next day, in company with my friend, I attended morning service at the Wesleyan chapel. At the conclusion of worship, a gentleman seated behind me asked to look at my Bible. In a few minutes he returned it, and I walked into the street. I was mounting the steps in front of the hotel where I was to dine, when the same gentleman laid his hand on my shoulder, and bgged to have a few minutes' conversation. We were shown into a private apartment. As soon as we were seated, he examined my countenance with great attention, and then began to sob; tears rolled down his cheeks; he was evidently laboring under intense emotion. He appeared to be about thirty-five years of age, was tall and slender, and neatly dressed, but apparently in bad health. He asked me several questions—my name, age, occupation, and birthplace. He then inquired if I had not, when a boy, many years ago, invited a drunken man to a seat in Dr. Beatty's church. I was astonished—the subject of my mother's anxiety and prayers was before me. Mutual explanations and congratulations followed, after which Mr. C. gave me a short history of his life.

He was born in the town of Leeds, in the east-riding of Yorkshire, of highly respectable and religious parents, who gave him a good education, and trained him up in the way of righteousness. When about fifteen his father died, and his mother's straitened circumstances obliged her to take him from school, and put him to learn a trade, where he imbibed all manner of evil, became incorrigibly vicious, and broke his mother's heart. Freed now from all parental restraint, he left his employers, and traveled to Scotland. In the city of Glasgow he had lived and sinned for two years, when he was arrested in his career through my mother's instrumentality. He confessed that, on leaving the church, on the first Sunday, he was seized with pangs of unutterable remorse. The sight of a mother and son worshiping God together, recalled the happy days of his own boyhood, when he went to church and Sunday-School, and when he also had a mother—a mother whose latter days he had embittered, and whose gray hairs he had brought with sorrow to the grave. His mental suffering threw him on a bed of sickness, from which he arose a changed man. He returned to England, cast himself at the feet of his maternal uncle, and asked and obtained forgiveness. His conviction of sin, his battlings with temptation, his repentance, his victory over the world, the growth of his faith in the great atonement, and finally, his peace in believing, formed a deeply interesting and instructive narrative. With his uncle's consent he studied for the ministry; and on being ordained, he entered the missionary field, and had been laboring for several years in Southern Africa.

"The moment I saw your Bible this morning," he said, "I recognized it, and the examination of the writing, which is still legible on the blank leaf, assured me that I was not mistaken. You now see from what I was rescued by the unfathomable love and boundless grace of God, through your own and your mother's instrumentality. I was dragged from the very brink of infamy and destruction, and saved as a brand from the burning. You remember Dr. Beatty's text on the day of my salvation: 'Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days.' The proud, hardened, scoffing sinner is found, after thirteen years, a humble minister of salvation to the benighted heathen, and your sainted mother is doubtless enjoying the reward of those who turn many to righteousness."

LABOR THE ROAD TO WEALTH.

It was said to man, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." It was said by Him who cannot lie, nor be mistaken. It was said to the first man, as the representative of the race. It was set forth as a law, from which there was to be no escape. And though the rigors of the law have been modified by the gospel, and by those improvements in the arts and sciences which have followed in the train of the gospel, it is still the law of man's earthly existence.

To be possessed of such a competency as will obviate the necessity of toil, is the ambition of all. Hence, when any scheme which promises the sudden accumulation of wealth is proposed, immediately every one is eager to avail himself of it. Success will surely crown the enterprise, and in a few years one will be able to say, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." The hard-working farmer, that grubs the rocky soil of New England, hears of fertile prairies in the West, and emigrates thither in the hope of raising forty or fifty bushels of wheat to the acre, and corn without the trouble of preparing the soil. It is proclaimed, that there is abundance of gold in California and Australia, and thousands of adventurers are at once on their way to those countries. The mechanic, that toils early and late, and gains but little more than suffices for his daily necessities; the trader, whose profits are small; the teacher, whose time, patience, and brains are tasked to the utmost for only a moderate compensation; the common laborer, who lays up scarcely fifty dollars a year—all seem to be infatuated with the idea that there is some short road to wealth, and will by no means be persuaded of the contrary.

We shall not deny, that there are instances of persons who have become suddenly wealthy. But their wealth has either been bestowed upon them as a gift, or they have got it by fraud, or in the pursuit of some unlawful calling. It happens, however, that riches thus obtained seldom remain long with the possessor. Such is the rigidness with which Providence guards his own laws, that whoever has property which he has not earned by honest toil, soon gets rid of it, and comes back to that condition which obliges him to labor. The children of wealthy parents commonly die poor. No matter what pains are taken to render their patrimony permanent, there is always some crevice through which it leaks away. Property obtained by fraud is soon scattered. The very success which has attended the getting of it, endangers its permanency. For the gambler, bewitched with his good fortune in the first experiment, ventures again, and is stripped of all. The lottery dealer, or the speculator in stocks, is never satisfied with one or two successful enterprises, but repeats his ventures, till a turn in affairs renders him poor as the very poorest.

But we lay it down as a heaven-appointed law, that whoever acquires wealth honestly, and expects to hold it permanently, must acquire it by pursuing that business which, while it enriches himself, is the means of good to others. It follows, that there can be no sudden accumulation of it. He that suddenly grows rich, does so at others' expense. If his business is large, employing a great number of operatives, as is usually the case with those who make large fortunes, it is found, upon inquiry, that most of those operatives are working at prices barely sufficient to keep them from starving. Were it otherwise, the gains of the proprietor could not be so enormous. An ample remuneration to every man and woman employed, would so moderate his own gains that his property, though it would accumulate surely, would accumulate but slowly. Indeed, when we hear of one who, after being but a short time in business, is said to have acquired vast wealth, we always suspect that he has failed to observe the golden rule. His business has not been the means of good to others in any thing like that degree which it has to himself, either in single instances, or in the aggregate number of those who have been affected by it.

Of the thousands who have gone to the gold regions, how many have realized their fond dreams? Not one in ten thousand. It has been found there, as every where else, that those who would accumulate must sweat and toil. The law is imperative, and those who undertake to get beyond its reach will find, sooner or later, that they are fighting against God.

Considering the depravity of mankind, nothing could be much worse than the sudden accumulation of wealth by any considerable portion of community. Money is a potent engine of evil, and thrown into the hands of corrupt men, it renders them proud, overbearing, persecuting and cruel. Most wisely is it ordered, that riches shall not usually rest very largely in a person, till the impetuous fires of youth have burnt out, and the discipline of a long and laborious life has chastened and subdued him.

MISSIONARY MEETING AT WESTERLY.

The Committee on Outfit present the following report of the proceedings of the Missionary Meeting held at Westerly, R. I., on the 8th inst., to the friends of the Mission who were not present to enjoy the pleasure of that interesting occasion. The members of the Committee who were present were pleased with the manner and spirit of the proceedings, and only regret that more of the brethren could not have been there to witness the exercises.

The Sermon of Eld. Lucius Crandall.

The discourse was designated to show—

1st. That the Jews having been constituted the chosen people of God by the faith of and promises made to Abraham, had never been excluded from the grace of God and offers of mercy, by any act of God—that though many individuals who heard the preaching of Christ, and participated in the tragedy of his death, might thus have so sinned against the Holy Ghost that they could never be forgiven, yet others of the nation, not so connected with that matter, were not of necessity involved in that terrible curse; and especially, that the succeeding generations of the Jews, from that time to the present, could not be necessarily doomed to eternal wrath on account of the sins of those who lived before them. The speaker allowed, however, that the evil effects of the rejection of Christ by that generation did greatly embarrass and endanger their posterity—that it must, as a consequence, have affected them to the third and fourth generations, or even longer. Still, he insisted, that God had never rendered their salvation impossible, either as a nation, or as individuals, on account of the acts of their fathers. He maintained that the argument of the Apostle, in the eleventh chapter of Romans, supported that view, and quoted several passages from that chapter as expressing that doctrine; among which was the first verse: "I say, then, hath God cast away his people? God forbid. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." He also read several extracts from "The Occident," (a magazine published in Philadelphia by the Jews,) for the purpose of showing that the Jews understand Christians to teach that they are not only suffering exile and dispersion from their ancient home, but even hopeless exclusion from the mercy and grace of God; at least, during the period of their expatriation. One of the extracts read from the Occident, was as follows. It is from a sermon entitled "The Hope of Israel," found in the tenth number of the eleventh volume of that work. The writer, after alluding to the sentiment held by Christians, or Nazarenes, as he calls them, that salvation came through Israel, says:—

"Without gainsaying in the least the truth of this assertion, since we are not disposed to deny to any human being the hope of salvation in the Lord, by the pursuit of the right, so far as this is known to him; we cannot assent to the deduction which the Gentiles make, that their admission to grace has caused our rejection. First, because the Gentiles never were excluded from divine mercy, from the calling of Abraham down to this hour. Many, no doubt, forfeited everlasting bliss by their manifold transgressions against the light they had received, and in contravention to the truths which had been made known to mankind from the beginning; but this does not say that there was any inherent defect in the spirit of the Gentile from enjoying the rewards to which his virtues, be they many or few, might have entitled him from the impartial judge of all flesh."

Again that writer says:—

"Secondly, even granting, for argument sake, that until a certain fixed period, the Gentiles had been excluded from God's mercy, which we cannot admit; still we are constrained to affirm, that their admission to favor can on no account have wrought our expulsion from the mansions of our Father! Is not His power far-reaching enough to extend over each and all of His creatures? Is His goodness limited, that it needs must be exhausted, unless some are doomed to unhappiness?"

These quotations were also intended to show, that the sentiment of such exclusion of the Jews from God's mercy (if taught by Christians,) furnished the Jews with plausible arguments against Christianity, and if that doctrine were a part of that system, it would constitute a real objection to it.

2d. The speaker endeavored to show, that the Jews were, and had been, always, proper objects of Christian effort. For that purpose he presented the 31st verse of the eleventh of Romans, at the commencement of his discourse, as a text, or principal theme of remark; said verse reads thus: "Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they may also obtain mercy." It was urged from this text, that the Jews were to be converted through the instrumentality of the Gentile Christians. The expression of the Apostle, "That blindness in part hath happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in," was quoted to show that the conversion of the Jews would take place when Christianity should become developed in a certain degree of purity and perfection among the Gentiles. From those passages, the scope of the Apostle's argument throughout, and the nature of things, it was plead, with apparent reason, that, to consummate that end, the gospel must not only be preached by men prepared for and ordained to that work, but that the publication of the gospel must be accompanied with a spirit and heart of mercy, which would reduce that gospel, and its principles, to a living, practical reality, in doing good to the Jews, both in respect to their temporal and spiritual necessities. The examples of Christ—his healing the sick, and feeding the hungry—were employed, or referred to, in support of such views of the case. The speaker also presented several extracts from the Occident, to show the reasonableness of his opinion, and showing at the same time the views held by the Jews on the subject, and the interest they feel in respect to it. The extracts on this point were from articles in that work on Palestine, and were as follows:—

"From the first time we came before the public with our work, we have not omitted to call periodically the attention of Israelites to the deplorable condition of the residents of Palestine. Without industry, without agriculture, without commerce, they are necessarily dependent on charity to procure the common necessaries of life." * * * *

"Do we, then, counsel to abandon the poor already in Palestine to themselves? God forbid that we should harbor such a thought; we do not wish to check the pious current of thought which sets with instinctive force towards the home of our race; but we should like, by doing something useful for that land, to have an interest in its soil, and try to elevate its inhabitants from the low degree of unlaboring idleness—it is no use to qualify the words—unlaboring idleness, to the rank of independent, industrious freemen. We know that we shall be met with the question, "Do you desire to shut up the schools and colleges where the law is studied day and night? Do you wish to degrade those whose trade is the law, to become mere plowmen and laborers?' Though some may blame us for so speaking, we will answer to the last question affirmatively; we would not degrade them, however, by so doing, but elevate them far above their present condition; but we would not diminish the schools, or dim in the least the light of the colleges, which we honestly think would become more energetically useful by having to operate on a free, high-minded people, living by their own industry, instead of on a crushed, timid race, that shrink before their oppressors into the smallest corner, for fear of exciting their wrath." * * *

"We need not be reminded, that at present the hills are naked, stripped of the soil which once rendered them fertile. But we have read in a late publication, that they are limestone rock, and that it would not require overmuch labor, by breaking them up with the spade and plough, to make them pay the husbandman's toil with plentiful crops of all kinds of farm produce. This is said to be the case even with the naked hills; but what should we say of the fertile valleys, which now lie desolate, because there is no farming population to plant them? Other lands suffer because the population is too dense for their productiveness; but here is a spot situated in the center of the courts of commerce between the east and the west, weeping, so to say, because there are too few to satisfy its cravings to nourish them. And who, more than the Israelites, have a claim on the soil of Palestine, to obtain therein their support? Who, more than we, are better calculated to draw the full benefit of Nature's bountiful gifts in our ancient patrimony? Many nations have borne sway over it; but it has not responded with its healthful products to their desire; just as the instrument of some great musician refuses its mellifluous sounds to any other hand than its master's, who knows its full power, and how to elicit all its sweetness."

This writer, in a subsequent article on the same subject, having expressed himself favorably respecting the Jews being taught husbandry by Christian missionaries, proceeds as follows:—

"We may be asked, why we should take any notice whatever of those who come to preach against our religion, and unite for any purpose whatever with men who deem our faith as depriving us of a chance of salvation? But we would beg leave to remind our readers, that the first thing we ought to do for the poor of Palestine, is to teach them something by which their depressed state can be improved—by which means they might bid defiance to the attempts against their religion to which they are now constantly exposed. The missionaries and their friends think that an improved condition in their wordly affairs would make them more inclined to listen to Christian preaching. Hence, both Jews and Christians will have, according to their opinions, looking at the matter from different points of view, attained their end, if they could combine to benefit in material things the poor of Palestine, and this comprises the whole Jewish population. If, indeed, we could hope to obtain a sufficient number of intelligent and practical Hebrew farmers, from any part of the world, to take charge of an agricultural establishment, whether small or large, we should not hesitate to refuse the proffered help of missionaries. But, unfortunately, we have no such expectation; we know of no men or class of men among us to come to our aid; hence the poverty of Palestine must continue as it is, without any amelioration, or we must not throw away the voluntarily-offered aid of agricultural American missionaries, no matter what their ultimate object may be."

Further, the same writer says:—

"Hence, we say, could a numerous agricultural population be drawn to Palestine, we should not only contribute towards the permanent relief of those residing there already, but we should open an asylum for many who now know of freedom only as a traditionary word, recorded in Scripture, as once their own in ancient days, of which they and their fathers before them have lost the true signification."

From the foregoing extracts, taken in connection with the benevolence of pure Christianity, and above all, the example of Christ, who went about doing good to the bodies as well as the souls of men, it was insisted, that it was right, and necessary, and especially under existing circumstances, to connect an industrial, and particularly an agricultural department with our mission to Palestine. It was remarked in this connection, that a desire had been expressed on the part of the Jews, that the missionaries would agree not to attempt to instill their religious principles into the minds of Israelites while in their employment; but that, of course, no such thing would be done—that it was entirely out of the question.

It was further held, that though the nation of Israel had been elected by God to fill a particular office or position, and though they were still his chosen people, yet that since the righteous individuals of that nation, and also of all nations, were from their characters, naturally, the only proper agents or men to advance his cause; and as from their characters, as foreknown by God, they were the objects of his approbation and pleasure; therefore, they were the elect of God, the remnant according to the election of grace—the elect in the highest sense of that word. It was admitted, that God acted as a sovereign in the choice he made of individuals, or nations, to fill certain spheres, but it was denied that he ever acted without regard to the character of the subject of that election, as foreknown by Him—that in the call of Abraham God acted in view of his character, as a suitable representative of the faithful in all the world, both Jews and Gentiles. The preference of Jacob over Esau, announced before they were born, or, of course, had done either good or evil, was instanced as a case in which, though God would show that the matter stood in his counsel, yet he did not act regardless of the respective characters of those individuals. Hence it was argued, on the supposition that our missionaries were in heart devoted to the service of God, that they were, in common with all the righteous, the elect of God to do his pleasure. The speaker concluded with a strongly-expressed desire, that God would sanctify them for their work, so that, however weak and incompetent they may be supposed to be, good may be done, and the cause of God prospered by their means.

Abstract of Remarks by Sister E. P. Jones.

The missionary work abroad is the same in kind as that which is to be performed at home. Christianity is the same everywhere. Many there are, who labor as faithfully at home as those who go abroad. Christians should labor everywhere to elevate and bring to Christ fallen, degraded humanity, under whatever circumstances it may be found. Christ suffered for us, and we should be willing, amidst suffering, to bear the cross and lead souls to Him.

She might speak of her labors in the West Indies—of the interest she felt in behalf of that field—of the distribution of God's word there—for all of which there is a bright assurance that it will not return unto Him void. Though deeply interested for the Haytiens, her regard for their spiritual welfare did not detract from the interest she felt and hoped to exercise in behalf of Palestine. Your prayers, sympathies, and active co-operation will be needed; we feel assured we shall have them, because your liberal donations, your prayers, and your hospitality, are evidences of the heart you have in the mission. She had an interest and a duty in this work—felt to give herself to the cause for life. Were it not thus, she could not so cheerfully deprive herself and her little daughter of Christian society, friends, and privileges, so dear, so precious to all. She loved home, and country, but desired to be found in the way of duty wherever the Saviour called her to go. The trials and responsibilities of the undertaking are great, and great faith is requisite to the task. The path of duty is the path of safety. An interest in the prayers of the brethren and sisters was earnestly desired, that she, with the rest of the little band, might meet with success and prove faithful unto the end.

Substance of Sister Saunders' Remarks.

My dear brethren and sisters, I feel that this work is great, and my station a responsible one. And in view of this, I have tried to weigh the matter candidly and prayerfully. And I am now willing to give myself, soul and body, to the work; and I feel a sweet assurance that God approves of this humble offering. Yet it pains my heart to leave my dear friends. I would gladly live and die with you, and here be buried. I love you all. But I love the cause of God more. We may meet with trials, hardships, and persecutions. Yes, we expect them. But these things do not move me. For my trust is in God. I ask your prayers, that we may be the instruments in the hand of God in bringing his chosen people to the light of the gospel, and that we may ever be guided by the Holy Spirit, that in all of our labors we may glorify God.

Substance of Bro. Saunders' Remarks.

Dear brethren and sisters, I stand before you to-day, unworthy as I am, one of your representatives in the common cause of our Master to the land of Palestine. In looking about me, I see many that are better qualified for the station than myself, and had my brethren called some one of them to this field of labor, instead of myself, I should have been entirely satisfied. But since they have chosen me, I have not felt at liberty to refuse. I expect, by Divine permission, to go there and labor to the best of my ability. If, through your prayers and the blessing of God, I am able to do something to benefit my fellow-beings, and in some way meet your wishes and be approved of God, I shall be satisfied. My idea of the Christian religion is, to do good to all as we have opportunity, not simply by teaching the doctrines of the gospel alone, but labor to benefit their bodies, increase their earthly comforts and happiness, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and give a cup of water to the thirsty, all in the name of Christ, and in this way we hope to lead them to the Redeemer of lost man. Dear brethren and sisters, my prayer is, and I trust ever will be, that you prove faithful to God, and so build up a church that he will own and bless. Pray for us, that we may stand in the day of trial.

Abstract of Remarks by Wm. M. Jones.

My education, previous to giving my heart to God, prepared me to think seriously of the heathen. The dying advice of my mother was, that I should read and love the Bible. The Sunday-school Library furnished reading on the History of Missions (of which I was very fond) in the South Sea Islands, Greenland, Labrador, India, and Burmah. Upon making a profession of religion, my soul was drawn out very fervently for the conversion of sinners, and it was not long before I felt it my duty to consecrate my life to the gospel ministry. At the same time, I regarded myself as subject to a call to go wherever God in his all-wise providence might direct. With the impression that duty demanded it, I went to Hayti; and now, equally impressed that God calls me to the work, I go to Palestine. No special revelation guides or enlightens my mind in regard to this work. His Word and Spirit, and the circumstances of life, seem to say, This is the way, walk ye in it.

The enterprise before us is one of thrilling interest and great responsibility. We this day find ourselves commencing a work which our fathers, mothers, brethren and sisters, have longed to see begun; to wit, the occupation of a portion of the land of Israel, and, by the use of those humble means, always blessed of God, the conversion of the people to Jesus Christ; in other words, the establishment of a gospel mission in the land of Palestine.

We are about to "go down," as Carey once said, "into a deep, dark," and as yet almost unexplored "mine;" and though we feel assured of light enough from above, to seek out and return to God some of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and also some of the Gentiles, yet we are disposed to ask of you, brethren, "to hold on to the rope" while we descend. So far as human agency can furnish it, you have pledged us the means of support; we doubt not your ability, nor your willingness, to give to us according as our necessities may require.

You expect of us diligence in our labors, deeds of love, and the fruits of faith; gathered in meekness, with gratitude, and with many tears; and we feel in our hearts, that to go forth, sent by the Lord of Missions, we shall have the glorious privilege of meeting you in heaven, laden with many sheaves, and bringing with us many stars to deck the crown of your rejoicing.

In giving you an account of our labors, you may expect of us facts, rather than opinions; we hope our report of the land and of our doings will tend to increase your confidence and to stimulate you to renewed benevolence in the cause of missions.

There is much land to be possessed. The world is before you, the harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few; therefore pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest.

In leaving our native land, we put up many prayers for the redemption of the slave—our humble influence is pledged in his behalf. And may we not ask you, brethren, to cease not, to give yourselves no rest, in prayer and personal effort, till God comes and delivers our brethren from the house of bondage! Further, let us not forget the Sabbath—the neglected and rejected Sabbath of Jehovah should receive our special and unremitted love, prayers, labors, and a hearty commendation to our fellow men.

In short, as a missionary [Carey] once said: "Let us attempt great things for God, and expect great things from God." Enlarge, then, dear brethren, the sphere of your operations. Go on—go on in the good work, till every one of you shall appear before God in Zion. The more you do, the more you will feel like doing in this holy cause. Train yourselves and your children for the missionary work, and you will realize all the blessings implied in the saying of our Lord: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

We this day have occasion to sympathize with each other. Tender ties are about being sundered. Do I say sundered? Rather, they are about being strengthened. Time and space will soon separate us, but our affection for each other will grow stronger and more holy. This parting season is a trial; to some, it is the first trial of the kind; their wounds, fresh and deep, are painful, but cannot be described. Oh, may they have grace to say, "Thy will, O God, be done." Others of us have thrice experienced this painfully pleasing duty. But we shall not attempt to lift the veil which discloses this part of missionary life commenced at home. We severally leave parents, brothers, sisters, relatives, home and country, yet we repine not—we regret not the step—we rather congratulate ourselves, in view of the object of our mission, that we love each other the more.

Many an anxious look shall we cast across the blue wave homeward, but oftener we hope to look upward, and learn to love our eternal home. To-day the Master sends us to regions beyond you. The field of your toil is here at home; ours is abroad; both of us are workers together in his vineyard; by and by He will call the laborers to himself. Let us all so occupy, so fill up the measure of our days, that when the sun declines, and the day is past, we may hear the welcome call, COME HOME!

Let us pray for one another; we shall need your prayers; we see not how we can well do without them. Pray that the word of the Lord, through us, may have free course and be glorified; and when you pray, believe that "the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

We go to Palestine to preach Christ and him crucified. It shall be our aim to hold him up to Jew and Gentile as the only Saviour of lost men. Pray, brethren, that nothing may turn us from this great and glorious purpose.

In view of the nature and rewards of our calling as Christians, let us be willing to live as strangers, pilgrims, and good Samaritans, in order that Christ may be preached and lived, and souls saved through the Redeemer's blood.

We commend you to God and to the word of his grace. May we all live humbly and faithfully, and then, through grace, rich grace in Jesus Christ, we shall meet in heaven, and join those who have come up through great tribulation, in singing, NOT UNTO US, NOT UNTO US, BUT UNTO THY GREAT NAME, BE ALL THE GLORY.

The remarks of Eld. Greene were not obtained, as expected by the Committee; they were, however, in keeping with the sentiments of the occasion, and suggestive of the wisdom and caution required in the prosecution of the difficult and peculiar duties assigned to them by their brethren.

The right hand of fellowship was extended to the Missionaries by Eld. Alfred B. Burdick, and on giving the hand of fellowship to the Missionaries, Eld. B. remarked substantially as follows:—

Beloved brethren and sisters—I am requested by my brethren present to extend to you, in behalf of the Missionary Board, and in behalf of the brethren and sisters of this denomination, the hand of fellowship, to go forth and preach Christ and him crucified to the poor and destitute in the land where our blessed Saviour lived, labored and died. I do, therefore, in their behalf, and in my own, extend to you, and to each of you, this right hand, welcoming you to all the labors, to all the sorrows and privations, and to the glorious rewards, connected with this blessed work.

Be assured, dear brethren and sisters, that it has not been our object, in calling you to this work, to make a sacrifice of you. No, the tender ties which bind you to our hearts forbid it. The estimate which we place upon you forbids it also. From a sense of our obligation to "do good to all as we have opportunity," and from a view of our especial obligation to the literal seed of Israel, from whose hands and through whose unbelief we have obtained gospel calling and mercy, we send you forth to do good.

Remember, that when you shall have gone from amongst us, we shall love you, and pray for you still. We heartily respond to the sentiment just uttered by one of your number, "that the chords of affection that unite us, will not be sundered but strengthened by our parting." Yes, those silken ties will stretch across the wide ocean, and hold you in the embrace of our warm hearts while in your distant home. For you, and for success to attend your efforts in Palestine, our united prayers shall constantly ascend to God. In all that may concern you, we shall feel a deep and increasing interest. In your temporal extremities, we will divide with you, to the last of our earthly substance. The tidings of your success will ever be a source of comfort and encouragement to us; still, we shall be rejoiced most of all to hear of your faithfulness to your duty and to your God. And I would beseech you to bear in mind, for your consolation in your seasons of despondency, that your fidelity, and not your achievements, will be the measure of your Saviour's approbation.

Beloved brethren and sisters, go forth to your holy work; be true to your weighty responsibilities; and whether you shall be engulfed in the deep sea, and not permitted to reach your destined port; or whether you shall fall by the hand of savage violence, or by the slow decay of wasting disease; or, when wearied and worn with a long life of holy toil, you shall, with your armor on, lie down to rest;—whatever may await you, in life or in death, we believe that God will be honored by your efforts, and that you will be rewarded in heaven. May the smiles of God rest upon you all, and cause you to be abundantly instrumental in blessing and leading to Christ the thousands whose sighs of anguish come up to us from the land of Zion.

The choir performed their part well, and the fine-toned organ with which the church have provided themselves, was, under the skillful hands of sister Vincent, no unwelcome auxiliary to the well-trained voices of the singers.

ANTI-NEBRASKA MEETINGS.—Large and enthusiastic meetings in opposition to the Nebraska Bill now before Congress, and to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, have been held in various parts of the country. Of course we have not room to report the proceedings of such meetings, or even to give a list of them. A People's Meeting, held at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on the evening of the 18th inst., drew together five thousand people, mainly from the mechanical and laboring classes. It was presided over by Joseph P. Simpson, and was addressed by Joseph Blunt, John P. Hale, and Rev. H. W. Beecher. Among its resolves was one, "that the pretense that the repeal of the Missouri Compromise is a legitimate consequence of the Acts of 1850, is without foundation in fact;" another, "that the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, in order to introduce slavery into our free territory of Nebraska and Kansas, would be in every point a crime, a breach of plighted faith, a violation, not only of our just rights, but of the rights of man, in defiance alike of Republican principles and Christian duty."

THE CLOTHES QUESTION.—A new question is before the people (or the newspapers,) on which much feeling exists. It seems that in years past the diplomatic agents of the United States have been accustomed, when invited to Court parties or shows, to put on laced coats and trousers, short swords, and other trumpery. Recently, however, Mr. Marcy, our Secretary of State, recommended these gentlemen to change their practice in this respect, and to dress on such occasions as they would dress at home, or on a visit to the President of the United States. In accordance with this advice, Mr. Buchanan, our envoy in London, refused to dress himself in livery on occasion of the recent opening of the British Parliament; consequently he was not permitted to see the grand show. The question now before the newspapers is, whether Brother Jonathan has been insulted.

THE OLD BREWERY AND THE NEW MISSION HOUSE AT THE FIVE POINTS. By Ladies of the Mission. Six Illustrations. New York: Stringer & Townsend, 222 Broadway, under the Museum.

A handsome volume of 300 pages, giving an interesting history of the Old Brewery and of the commodious Mission House by which that unenviably notorious building has been supplanted. Some of the illustrations here furnished of the success of the Five Points Mission, surpass in romantic interest all works of fiction. The book is issued under the direction of the ladies engaged in efforts to renovate the Five Points, and will doubtless increase the interest already felt in their enterprise.

PASTORAL THEOLOGY; or, THE THEORY OF THE EVANGELICAL MINISTRY. By A. VINET. Translated and edited by Thomas H. Skinner, D. D., Professor of Pastoral Theology in the Union Theological Seminary of New York. With Notes, and an additional Chapter, by the Translator. New York: Ivison & Phinney, 178 Fulton-st.

This is the second edition of a very valuable book. The subject of it occupied M. Vinet's attention for many years, and in this volume he has given the substance of his instructions in the Academy of Lusanne. The book is worthy of a place in the library of every minister of the Gospel.

The Time to Strike.—The Macedonian (the organ of the Baptist Missionary Union,) invites special attention to the following remarks of Mr. Granger, on the state of public feeling in Burmah:—

"There is a general feeling induced, as if the old religion had been broken down, more especially in those parts of the country above Rangoon, where little was previously known respecting the foreigners. Great numbers have recently avowed themselves to be paramats, a class of free-thinkers who abjure Boodhism. The shock to the prevailing religion is accidental, and will soon cease to be felt. It affords a present very favorable opportunity, not for those missionary measures which are slow in their plan and remote in the benefits they promise, but for the direct and open preaching of the Gospel to the adult population. Unless the minds of the people, now remarkably open, are soon instructed in the simple truths of Christianity, they will return to their former unquestioning faith in Boodhism, more unquestioning and more bigoted than before. Thus it has proved in the old British provinces of Burmah, where idolatry has now a stronger hold upon the public mind than it has in Pegu. The present is the hour for action. If we neglect the opportunity, either from want of men to use it, or from want of faith in the preaching of the Gospel as the sufficient means for the conversion of Burmans equally with Karens, years must pass before we can regain the ground now open for us."

American Baptist Publication Society.—The last quarterly Baptist Record informs us that the American Baptist Publication Society finds its present quarters too straight—and that its increasing business demands more room. It is proposed to sell their premises on Arch-street, with the design of erecting a larger building on Chesnut-street, which will require $30,000 more than their present building will sell for; the total amount to be $55,000. Two members of the Board have subscribed $5,000 each, leaving $20,000 to be raised in Philadelphia and vicinity, which it is expected will shortly be obtained. It is proposed, also, to raise a fund of $20,000 for publishing purposes—one who subscribed $5,000 for the above object, offers to pay $1,000 for this.

Revival among the Swedes.—An Iowa correspondent of the Christian Times states that of twenty converts lately added to the church in Burlington, several are Swedes. These, he says, "have been converted and brought to the truth mainly through the labors of our beloved exiled Swede, Rev. Fred. O. Nillson, who, banished from his native land because of his religion, and then sent hither to Burlington by our Home Mission Society to labor among his countrymen in this place, has been honored of God in commencing here, as we trust, a more glorious work."

Sects in Minnesota.—The Roman Catholics in Minnesota far outnumber all other denominations. Bishop Cretin, of the Catholic Church, has it in contemplation to build a cathedral at St. Paul's, during the present year, at a cost of $90,000. The Methodists have four separate churches in the Territory, and two Missions among the Indians. The Presbyterians have six churches and six missions; the Calvinistic Baptists have three churches, and the Free Will Baptists one; the Episcopalians have regular service at two places, and missionaries who regularly visit, on foot, every village in the Territory.

Our Missionaries in China.—The last English steamer brought an overland letter from Mr. Carpenter, dated Nov. 27, 1853, giving further particulars of the Revolution in China. Extracts from this letter will probably soon appear in the Recorder. In conclusion, Bro. Carpenter says, "At no former period of our sojourn in this country has the health of the members of our mission been better than at present."

Fire at Leonardsville.—The village of Leonardsville, Madison Co., N. Y., was visited, on the morning of the 10th inst., with an extensive conflagration, destroying the grist-mill, saw-mill, fork factory, and turning shop—all belonging to the Leonardsville Manufacturing Company. Loss estimated at 9,000 to 10,000 dollars. A little less than $3,000 was covered by insurance.

A new Presbyterian house of worship in St. Louis was dedicated on the 8th inst., which cost $70,000, and that amount was paid out by Mr. H. D. Bacon, of the firm of Page & Bacon, of that city, without calling on the Society for a dollar. At a meeting of the Church and Society to consider this debt, Mr. Bacon proposed to give $40,000 of the amount if the Society would raise $30,000, and in three days the amount was raised and the Church set free from debt.

Dr. McClintock, the editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, in noticing a Methodist work entitled "Christian Baptism and the Lord's Supper," adds: "The only point on which it does not speak as definitely as we could wish, is that of the relation of baptized children to the church, a subject which greatly needs clearing up. The Methodist church, like other Protestant denominations, (excepting those who deny infant baptism,) seems to be quite at sea on the question."

Rev. S. G. Miner writes to the Christian Times from Canton, Ill., that a work of unusual power and interest is progressing in the church of which he is pastor. Sixty-two members have recently been added by baptism, of all ages, from the little child of twelve years to the old and gray-headed. Twenty of this number are from the Sabbath-school.

A resolution has been introduced into the legislature of Virginia, providing that no person conscientiously opposed to the institution of slavery as it exists in Virginia, or to holding negroes and mulattoes as slaves, as they are now held in Virginia, or who professes to be so opposed, shall be admitted to sit on any jury in any case involving a claim of freedom.

It is estimated by the census tables, that the number of men engaged in London alone upon omnibuses, on the Sunday, is as many as 6000.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 13.

In the Senate, the Nebraska bill was further discussed. Mr. Weller, having the floor, spoke in favor of the bill. Remonstrances against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise were presented by Senators Seward, Everett, Clayton, Sumner, Chase, Brodhead and Foote. Mr. Fish presented a memorial of merchants and others of New York for a modification of that part of the Revenue laws which forfeits a vessel for the illegal landing of goods valued at over $400. Numerous reports upon various subjects were presented and appropriately disposed of.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Washburn, of Illinois, was refused permission to present a remonstrance against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and two ineffectual attempts were made to revive the Deficiency bill.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 14.

In the Senate, several remonstrances were presented against the passage of the Nebraska bill. The French Spoliation bill was taken up and ordered to be engrossed by a vote of 26 to 17. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the debate on the Nebraska bill was resumed by Mr. Houston, who made a lengthy speech in opposition to the bill, which was not concluded when the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Homestead bill was considered in Committee of the Whole. The bill proposes to grant 160 acres of land to every man, being the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, on condition of occupying and cultivating the same for a specified period. Mr. Mace of Indiana, and Mr. Skelton of New Jersey, made able speeches in opposition to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 15.

In the Senate, Mr. Houston resumed and concluded his speech in opposition to the Nebraska bill. The French Spoliation bill was passed by a vote of 27 to 15. A bill to cede to Ohio all the public lands remaining unsold in the State was ordered to be engrossed. Mr. Douglas's amendment to the 14th section of the Nebraska bill was adopted by a vote of 35 to 10. Mr. Chase moved to amend the section as it now stands by adding the words "under which the people of the Territories, through their appropriate representatives, may, if they see fit, prohibit Slavery therein," which caused some debate.

In the House, several remonstrances were received against the passage of the Nebraska bill. The Committee on Military Affairs reported back the bill with the Senate's amendments for the relief of the troops who were sufferers by the wreck of the steamship San Francisco. The House concurred in two of the amendments. A memorial was received, signed by numerous citizens of the City of New York, against the right of Mike Walsh to a seat in the House, on the ground of his not being a citizen either by birth or naturalization, which was referred to the Committee on Elections. Mr. Meacham got the floor and made a short speech in opposition to the Nebraska bill.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 16.

In the Senate, several petitions and a large number of memorials remonstrating against the introduction of Slavery into the projected Territory of Nebraska were received, and a number of bills of no general interest were passed. Mr. Badger delivered his speech in favor of the Nebraska bill. When he had concluded, Mr. Seward got the floor.

The House took up and discussed at length the bill for the relief of Pensioners, under the act of February, 1853. Mr. Boyce of South Carolina, made a few remarks in favor of a reduction of the tariff. Other business of no general interest was transacted, and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 17.

In the Senate, after the consideration of the Private Calendar, Mr. Seward of New York addressed that body at great length in an argument in favor of the Missouri Compromise, and in opposition to the Nebraska bill. When Mr. S. concluded, Mr. Pettit of Indiana got the floor, who will speak on Second-day, to which time the Senate adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Dean presented the resolutions of the Legislature of New York against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The Senate bill to indemnify Indiana for the failure of a title to a township of land granted her by the General Government, was taken up and passed. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, when quite an exciting debate on the subject of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise took place, in which Messrs. Stephens of Georgia, Campbell and Giddings of Ohio, McMullen of Va, and Kerr of North Carolina, participated. The House adjourned over until Second-day.

Narrow Escape of a California-bound Steamer.—The steamer Georgia, with about 600 California-bound passengers, sailed from New York on the 6th inst., and was compelled to put in at Norfolk, Va., in distress. It seems that on the morning of the 9th inst., about 2½ o'clock, during a severe gale, the bows of the ship were stove in, the bowsprit, stem, and everything above the lower deck for about 30 feet aft from the stem, being carried away or rendered a complete wreck. The officers immediately sent passengers, cargo, guns, &c., aft, so as to lighten the bow. Fortunately, the wind died away, and in the morning there was a perfect calm. Had the sea been rough, or a gale sprung up, the ship would undoubtedly have foundered, and all on board perished; but with the advantage of a smooth sea and proper care, she managed to run into Norfolk.

Cherry Pectoral.—See in our advertising columns a notice of this medicine. We are not in the habit of saying much in relation to such medicines as are generally seen going the rounds of newspapers; but in relation to Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, we feel that we can say something in its favor with propriety, from the fact that we have tried it. A young man in our office has also used it, and in both his and our own case it proved most beneficial.—American Presbyterian, Greenville, Tenn.

Meneely's Bells at the World's Fair.—The Bells from the extensive establishment of Messrs. A. Meneely's Sons, West Troy, N. Y., received at the World's Fair recently held in the city of New York, the highest premium or only Silver Medal awarded for Bells. Their Church, Factory, Steamboat, School-House and Plantation Bells, as well as their Chimes, were adjudged by the Committee to be "the best in fullness and richness of tone, clearness of vibration, and workmanship," of any on exhibition. The Messrs. Meneely attach the more importance to the decision, from the fact that the Bell Founders of Europe were represented at the Crystal Palace, as well as those from the United States.

European News.

By the steamers Canada and America, we have one week later news from Europe.

The news from St. Petersburg was still indecisive. There was a report, which required confirmation, that a great battle had been fought at Kalefat on the 25th of January—the Turks victorious.

The rumor that Persia had re-established friendly relations with Turkey, is fully confirmed.

There is no doubt that the reply of the French and English Governments to the last Russian note is of a firm and decided character.

There is good reason to believe that France has decided to send eighty thousand and England ten thousand troops to the assistance of Turkey. The British Government is to pay one half of the total expenses of the two nations.

The British Parliament met on the 31st ult. The Queen's speech mentions the Turkish difficulty in moderate terms, and congratulates the nation in the French alliance. Her Majesty recommends an increase of the army and navy, in view of the fact that there is imminent danger of a general war.

Fresh insurrections had taken place among the Wallachian population, notwithstanding the Russian Generals had shot several peasants, taken with arms, fighting for the Turks.

The America brought home Capt. Watkins, Lieuts. Winder and Chandler, and 168 troops, taken from the wrecked steamship San Francisco by the ship Antarctic.

Later and Important.

The steamer Baltic, with Liverpool dates to Feb. 8th, (four days later,) arrived at New York on the 20th inst. By her we have intelligence that England and France are making open and extensive preparations for war. The Czar's last proposals have been rejected. The Russian Ministers have left London and Paris, and instructions have been sent to the French and English Ambassadors to withdraw from St. Petersburg. The horrors of war stare Europe in the face.

SUMMARY.

One of the most horrible and bloody affrays that has ever been recorded, took place at Camden, the county seat of Benton County, Tenn., on the 27th ult. Two brothers by the name of Anderson were in a drunken frolic, and while in that condition fell out with each other, which led to blows. From this they rushed upon each other with dirks and knives, cutting each other almost in pieces before they were separated. The elder brother has since died, and the youngest was not expected to live at last accounts.

A dispatch dated St. Louis, Thursday, Feb. 16, 1854, says: The Alton Packet Kate Kearney exploded her boilers at the wharf this morning, killing and wounding a large number of passengers. It is estimated that about twenty were killed and many were drowned. Major Beale, of the Army, is among those dangerously wounded. The steamer Amazon, bound for Memphis, struck a rock yesterday, and sunk five minutes after. Two passengers were drowned.

Speaking of quails, the Madison (Iowa) Journal says, that they are so plenty that they run about the streets, flying against and breaking windows, and occasionally come in contact with the side of a house, with such force as to fall lifeless to the ground. The consequence is, that every old musket has been put in requisition, the b'hoys are out in full force, and a general popping is heard in all directions.

From the registration tables, now regularly and well-kept, of births, marriages, and deaths in New York city, we note that 21 committed suicide in the last half-year, and 16 were murdered or killed. Three hundred and eighty-five died of small pox, and thirteen hundred and seventy from consumption. In December the total number of deaths was 1944—an average of 62 and a fraction a day, or nearly three each hour. The largest portion were between the ages of 30 and 40.

The foreign imports of Boston reached, the last year, to nearly forty-four millions of dollars—an increase of thirty per cent. over that of the year previous. The total imports of the United States in the year 1821 were a little short of the imports of Boston alone in 1852. The exports of Boston remain about the same from year to year, generally being from ten to twelve millions per annum.

The boats must not be expensive, nor exceed 1,000 pounds in weight.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Md., Feb. 19, says: The Prohibitory Liquor law passed the House of Delegates yesterday, by a vote of 42 to 23. It contains all the Maine Law restrictions, including the right of search, and the destruction of the liquor. It is to go into operation in May, 1856, providing it has been previously approved by a vote of the people.

Half a century ago, Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, Michigan, St. George and Superior, were entirely without commerce. Almost the only craft to be seen upon them was the Indian canoe. In 1850 their tunnage had raised to 215,000, and the value of the traffic to $362,000,000.

The late Phillip Price, of Chester County, Pa., was one of the best farmers of that county, and first to use plaster, upwards of fifty years ago, and it has been used continually upon that and other farms ever since. Mr. Price stated as the result of an application of plaster to eight acres, that the land was worth ten times as much as it was without the plaster, and it has never tired of its use from that day to this, though the effect of an application now is not so great as then, as a matter of course.

A small land-turtle was recently found on the farm of Timothy Bartholomew, Esq., Northford, L. Island, bearing the marks, "July 14, 1808, T. B. B. 2d." These marks were made upon the animal more than 45 years since by Timothy B. Bartholomew 2d, the father of the present owner of the farm, and the turtle yet retains an appearance of vigor and activity that may, for all we discover, enable it to live and move yet an hundred years.

In 1847 there were scarcely a dozen white inhabitants in the place now known as St. Paul, in Minnesota Territory. The village now contains 700 houses, and 4,700 inhabitants. The amount of taxable property in 1853 was $94,437. The capital at present invested in business is $825,000. In a few years St. Paul will be one of the most important places on the Mississippi River.

The question of having a uniform standard of weights and measures among the leading nations of Europe and the United States has occupied the attention of the American Geographical and Statistical Society of this City; and they have addressed a memorial to Congress on the subject, suggesting that a joint scientific commission be assembled at Brussels or some convenient place to arrange the necessary details.

It gives us pleasure (says the Boston Advertiser) to announce another proof of the liberality and of the love of good learning on the part of the Hon. Jonathan Phillips, exhibited in the donation of ten thousand dollars to Harvard University, for the increase of the endowment of the Greek Professorship in Harvard College.

A slave, aged 24, and a blacksmith by trade, sold at Augusta, Ga., last week, for $1,250, and another, who was a good bricklayer, for $1,250. The latter had knocked his master down with a brick, and therefore had been sold as a "good bricklayer."

The best purpose which coal ashes can be applied to, in town or country, is in making garden walks. If well laid down, no weeds or grass will grow, and by use they become as solid and more durable than brick.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Thursday, Feb. 16, 1854, says: A man residing at Fredonia, while on his way to New York, was robbed of $14,000 last night, at Hornellsville, by two men who had followed him.

The name of the Fredonia merchant who was knocked down and robbed of $14,000, at Hornellsville, on the night of the 15th, was Perkins. About two-thirds of the amount consisted of bills of the Chautauque County Banks, of various denominations, one-third of which was on the Bank of Silver Creek. A considerable amount was on H. J. Miners' Bank at Utica, and there were seven fifty dollar bills on the New York City, and one on the Commercial Exchange Bank. There was also a large quantity of silver. The money was done up in six separate packages, each wrapped in a piece of newspaper, and tied with common wrapping twine. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the Cherry Pectoral. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine Cherry Pectoral, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

Prepared by J. C. AYER, Chemist, Lowell, Mass.

Sold at wholesale in New York by A. B. & D. Sands; retail by Rushton, Clark & Co., and by all Druggists, everywhere.

Song of Humanity.

In the God of truth be strong!
For the Truth shall perish never,
Nor the weak be crushed forever--
Right shall triumph over Wrong!
Cherish then our bond of union,
Live in brotherly communion,
Love our neighbor, help our brother.
With our watchword cheer each other,
'Be Strong!'
In the God of truth be strong!

In the cause of man press on!
Let new sympathy be kindled
In the breast where love has dwindled;
Until [illegible] of soul be won!
He[illegible] our common altar,
With true hearts that never falter,
Let us pledge our life's devotion
To humanity's promotion,—
Press on!
In the cause of man press on!

Man is destined to be free!
Free from Slavery's aggression,
Free from tyranny's oppression,
And from cheerless poverty;
Free from prejudice and error,
Free from vice, that greatest terror,
Since that day of helpless Edom
Truth hath plead for human freedom,
Fear not!
Man is destined to be free! [N. Y. Tribune.

Common School Facts.

Maine taxes her banks to the amount of twenty thousand dollars a year, for the support of common schools. The income of a fund derived from the sale of public lands is seven thousand more, and every township is obliged by law to raise annually a sum for the support of schools equal to forty cents for each inhabitant. Every county in Maine has a school-commissioner, at a salary of two hundred dollars, who must spend at least fifty days a year, in examining the schools of his county.

New Hampshire spent, during 1853, the sum of $205,402 upon her common schools, of which she has 2,310. The male teachers are paid an average of $15 68 a month and their board; the female teachers only $6 96 —less than half! New Hampshire has taken measures to found a manual-labor school on the shores of Long Pond, near Concord, for the reform of juvenile delinquents.

Vermont maintains 2,594 common schools, at an annual cost of $217,402; pays her male teachers $13 55 a month, and her female teachers $5 54, exclusive of board. The schools are open, on an average, twenty four weeks in the year; and they contain thirty-nine pupils each, whose education costs the State $2 25 each per annum.

Massachusetts expends very nearly a million dollars a year in the support of her 4,056 public schools; besides the half million that is paid to private schools and colleges, of which there are about 820. The male teachers are paid, on an average, $37 25 a month; the female teachers, $15 36; and the schools are open seven and a half months in the year. The school libraries contain, altogether, 91,539 volumes; and apparatus to the amount of $23,825, has been distributed. The State supports three Normal schools, and one Reform school. In the latter, the boys work six hours a day, and study four.

Rhode Island boasts 335 schools, which are maintained at an annual cost of $114,160. In this State, the militia commutation tax is applied to the support of the schools.

Connecticut has 1,642 public schools, a Normal school, a Reform school, and 403 private schools. The school-fund alone yields a revenue of $1[illegible]3,693. Male teachers are paid, on an average $18 50 per month; females $8 20. Of the teachers employed last year, 220 had ten years' experience; 430, five years'; 500, three years'; 570, less than one year; and 45 schools were broken up through the imcompetence of the teachers. Summer schools were kept in all the districts, except 112.

New York expended, in the year 1852, the sum of $[illegible],249,814 upon her public schools, which number 11,587. There are also 1,472 private schools in this State. The number of children taught during the year was 862,507, of whom 1,416 were colored. There are thirty public schools composed exclusively of colored children, and several schools for the Indian children in the Reservations. The number of volumes in the district libraries is a little over a million and a half. The schools are kept open an average of seven and a half months; but there were more than 200,000 children who attended school less than two months in the year 1852. New York has a Normal school, a High school, and (we believe) three Reform schools, or houses of refuge. In the Normal school, there are usually from ten to fifteen Indian youths, preparing to become teachers of their own people.

New Jersey has 1,500 common schools, supported by an annual expenditure of $272,737. The whole number of children under instruction is 94,605, of whom 1,953 are colored. New Jersey has an invested school-fund of very nearly $400,000.

Pennsylvania maintains 9,699 public schools, at a cost of a little more than a million dollars a year. The average rate of compensation for male teachers is $18 75 per month; for females, $11 46; but the schools are kept open on an average only five months in the year. In Philadelphia, there are a Normal and a High school. The public schools of Philadelphia cost $7 16 a year, for each pupil.

Delaware has 236 common schools, and expends $49,469 a year in their support.

Maryland has a school-fund of $150,000.

Virginia, so far as we know, has no organized system of public schools; nor, we believe, have North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Texas.

South Carolina supports 1,023 common schools, attended by 9,022 pupils, at an annual cost of $40,580.

Georgia has a school-fund of $23,086, the interest of which is divided among the counties, according to the population.

Mississippi has no uniform school system. Each township has a school-fund arising from the lease of lands granted by Congress for common school purposes—every sixteenth section in each township having been so granted. These lands are leased mostly for ninety-nine years. The money thence arising is loaned annually at not less than eight nor more than ten per cent. per annum interest. This interest is the amount applied to tuition, etc., annually from the township fund. There is also a county fund, arising from fines, forfeitures, licenses, etc., which is distributed in those townships that are destitute, or have but a small school-fund.

Louisiana imposes a tax for school purposes of one million of dollars, and a poll tax of one dollar on each white inhabitant. There is also a school-fund of $125,025. The State supports 704 schools, and expends $25,000 a year upon them. Yet, there are more than 20,000 white children in the State who do not attend school at all.

Tennessee has a school-fund of nearly a million and a half dollars.

Kentucky has a fund nearly as large as that of Tennessee, and expends $111,000 a year for school purposes; but out of the 215,195 children in the State, only 69,825 attend school.

Ohio spends somewhat more than $300,000 a year in maintaining her 9,916 schools. In one year—1852—Ohio built 171 school-houses. The State is in earnest on the subject of education.

Indiana holds property, in trust, for the education of her children, which is valued at five millions of dollars. The income of this property, which consists chiefly of land, is to be devoted exclusively and for ever to the support of free schools.

Illinois has a school fund of nearly a million of dollars, which the State borrowed some years ago, at an interest of six per cent. The State can boast of 3,000 school-houses and seventy-six school libraries. Male teachers receive an average of $17 64 a month; females, $10.32; and the schools are kept open six months and twenty-three days in the year.

Missouri has a school-fund of half a million; and, in addition to this, the Legislature has appropriated one-fourth of the revenues of the State for the support of the public schools, which swells the amount to be annually distributed to $140,000.

Iowa has made a spirited beginning in behalf of public education. The constitution provides that a Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be chosen by the people for three years, and that all lands granted by Congress to this State, all escheated estates, shall constitute a perpetual fund, the interest of which shall be applied to the support of common schools; and all moneys received for exemption from military duty, and for fines imposed by the courts, shall be appropriated to support such schools, or for the establishment of school libraries.

Wisconsin has a school-fund of $816,220, and expends already more than $120,000 a year for educational purposes. There are nearly 2,000 schools in operation, which are provided with libraries, to the extent of 11,000 volumes. There are 66 school-houses of brick, 74 of stone, 778 of logs, and 812 framed, and all are valued at $261,986 32. The highest valuation of any school-house is $5,550, and the lowest $150.

California has made splendid provision for the future. The constitution provides for the election of a Superintendent of Public Instruction, to hold office for three years. By the same instrument, the proceeds of the public lands granted to the State for schools, the 500,000 acres granted to new States under the act of Congress, and estates of persons dying without heirs, shall be a fund, the interest of which, and the rents of unsold lands, are to be inviolably appropriated to the support of common schools. The Legislature has established a Board of Education for the State, consisting of the Governor, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, and the Surveyor General. Each town elects three persons as commissioners of schools for the town, and a constable as a common school marshal. Provision is also made for County Superintendents. The Legislature has devoted one-twentieth part of the tax upon real and personal property to the support of common schools. The public school system is already in operation, and more than 4,000 children are reported to be under instruction.

For the free instruction of the people, therefore, there are in the whole United States, in round numbers, 60,000 schools, which are supported at an annual expense of something less than six millions of dollars, of which sum more than half is expended by the two States of New York and Massachusetts.

A New Cheese Press.

Hackley's Cheese Press (says the N. Y. Tribune, is perhaps the most simple, cheap, effective machine that has ever been invented for the use of dairymen; but as assertions are not very convincing proof to those who want such implements as this, we will give a careful description of it: Fancy then a table seventeen inches high, supported upon four stout legs, with two posts rising four feet above, connected by arched top in which works an iron screw, one foot long, one and a half inch diameter, five threads to the inch. The bottom of the screw is attached to a square block ten inches by six, which works between two guide-bars framed in the posts. On the bottom of the screw there is a bevel wheel, four and a half inches in diameter, which works into another on an iron shaft about five inches long, resting horizontally in bearings on the frame in front of the screw. Upon the end of this shaft there is a crank twelve inches long, with a handle for turning the wheels to send the screw rapidly up or down, but that gives no power of continuous pressure. That is obtained by a very simple contrivance, as follows: On this crank shaft there is a spur wheel five and a quarter inches in diameter and about one inch thick, by the side of which an iron arm, three and a half feet long, hangs loosely on the shaft, so as not to interfere with its turning by the crank, which is turned so as to give all the pressure it can by hand, and then the iron arm is lifted up and an ingenious catch upon it hooks into the cogs of the wheel, which may be turned still harder by the increased power of the arm, and then a weight of twenty pounds on the arm will press a cheese of one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty pounds; or a weight of 15 for a cheese of sixty or eighty pounds, and this may be a basket or pail with stones or bricks, or any convenient article. In the first pressing of a cheese the arm will require to be lifted and catched anew two or three times, and once in the last pressing. The contrivance for putting cheeses in the press, turning them, or taking them out, is very ingenious. In the top of the table there is a wooden roller, which extends from one side to the other, and made to raise and fall, so that it lays with the top flush with the surface. Over this lies a movable board, two feet square, upon which the cheese stands to press. An iron bail two by two and a half feet hangs upon each side of the table, about six inches from the ends, when let down in front of the board, with a slight pressure of one hand or a foot lifts the roller so that the board and its load can be drawn forward by a child, till the front edge rests on the crane, so that the cheese can be handled with ease and without any inconvenience, and then rolled back to its place. The entire hight of the press is about five and a half feet, and it occupies two by two and a half feet of floor-room, or with the weight on the lever and room to turn down the bail and draw out the cheese-board, would require about three by five feet of space. The frame is made of oak in the most substantial manner, and the whole only weighs one hundred and twenty-five pounds.

Customs of the Turks.

Here is a whole volume concerning the customs, manners, and habits of the Turks, contained in a single paragraph:—

"The Turks abhor the hat; but uncovering the head, which with us is an expression of respect, is considered by them disrespectful and indecent. No offense is given by keeping on a hat in a mosque, but shoes must be left on the threshold; the slipper and not the turban is removed in token of respect. The Turks turn in their toes; they write from right to left; they mount on the right side of the horse; they follow their guests into a room, and precede them on leaving it; the left hand is the place of honor; they do the honors of the table by serving themselves first; they are great smokers and coffee drinkers; they take the wall, and walk hastily in token of respect; they beckon by throwing back the hand, instead of throwing it towards them; they cut the hair from the head; they remove it from the body, but leave it on the chin; they sleep in their clothes; they look upon beheading as a more disgraceful punishment than strangling; they deem our short and close dresses indecent, our shaven chins a mark of effeminacy and servitude; they commence their wooden houses at the top, and their upper apartments are frequently finished before the lower ones are closed in; they eschew pork as an abomination; they regard dancing as a theatrical performance, only to be looked at and not mingled in except by slaves; their mourning habit is white; their sacred color, green; their Sabbath day is Friday; and interment follows immediately on death. The deaths of women are not registered—those of the men are. Marriages are registered, and with the marriage the woman is virtually struck from existence, so far as the government is concerned. She is not known officially to the government of Turkey. Her 'lord' or husband does with her as pleases him best."

A Remarkable Story.

One night while Sir Evan Napean was under secretary to the home department, he felt the most unaccountable wakefulness that could be imagined; he was in perfect health, had dined early, and had nothing whatever on his mind to keep him awake. Still he found sleep impossible, and from eleven till two he never closed an eye. At length weary of this struggle, and as the twilight was breaking (it was summer,) he determined to try what would be the effect of a walk in the park. There was nothing but the sleepy sentinels. But in this walk, happening to pass the home office several times, he thought of letting himself in with his key, though without any particular object. The book of entries of the day before still lay on the table, and through listlessness he opened it. The first things he saw appalled him. "A reprieve to be sent to York for the coiners ordered for execution." The execution had been appointed for the next day. It struck him that he had received no return to his order to send the reprieve. He searched the "minutes"—he could not find it there. In alarm, he went to the house of the chief clerk, who lived in Downing street, aroused him—it was past three—and asked him if he knew any thing about the reprieve being sent. In great alarm, the chief clerk could not remember. "You are scarcely awake," said Sir Evan; "recollect yourself, it must have been sent. The chief clerk said that he now recollected he had sent it to the clerk of the Crown, whose business it was to forward it to York. "Good!" said Sir Evan, "but have you his receipt and certificate that it is gone?" "No." "Then come with me to his house; we must find him, it is so early."

It was now four, and the Clerk of the Crown lived in Chancery-lane. There was no hackney coach to be seen, and they almost ran. They were just in time. The Clerk of the Crown had a country house, and meaning to have a long holiday, he was at that moment stepping in his gig to go to his villa. Astounded at the visit of the Under Secretary of State at such an hour, he was still more so at his business. "Heaven!" cried he, "the reprieve is locked up in my desk!" It was brought. Sir Evan sent to the post office for the truest and fleetest express. The reprieve reached York the next morning, just at the moment when the unhappy men were ascending the cart.

The Next Crop.

The inducements held out to farmers to plant a large spring crop were never more flattering than at the present time. Wheat is higher this day than ever known before in New York, and so of all other grain. And these large prices are not entirely the result of speculation, based upon European war news. Independent of the war demand, there is a scarcity of breadstuffs abroad, which has already drawn off the surplus of our crops, until the price is affected by the natural law of demand and supply. The supply having become exhausted, and the great American granary, in a measure, emptied, the world calls upon the farmers to refill it. There is another demand for grain besides the foreign one, which will prevent prices from receding below the paying point for several years to come, and that is for the immense number of hands employed in building railroads. These works cannot be suddenly stopped, no matter what the pressure may be upon the money or grain market, because to stop them would be ruin to the capitalists. When a current once forms a channel, it is difficult to turn its course. The products of the American farmer have lately fallen into a channel, where the current of trade is sweeping them onward to marts before unknown, producing prices before unthought of. We therefore counsel our country friends to prepare for a great spring crop. Let them sow all the oats they can get into the ground in good order, in proper season; then plant corn upon every acre in good condition which can be devoted to that crop. Let them also sow buckwheat, turnips, and corn for fodder, so that they can sell a large proportion of all the grain produced.

At the West, and particularly in Southern Michigan, Northern Indiana, and Illinois, spring wheat is more extensively sown than the winter variety. Farmers in that region should not neglect the present opportunity to make a paying crop of this grain. Spring wheat sown early, rarely fails upon a prairie farm, where winter wheat is very uncertain. If possible, it should be sown in February; at any rate March should not pass before this crop is put in, even if it is necessary to wade over shoes in mud to do it. We have seen forty-five bushels per acre of spring wheat, though the usual crop is far below that, mainly owing to the very bad treatment it receives at the hands of the farmer.

Beans and peas, it will be seen, are quoted at $1 50 to $2 50 per bushel. Both of these are spring crops, and may be grown with profit upon almost any farm in the country. Lastly, look at the price of potatoes, which are now selling for $3 50 per barrel—more per bushel than corn, and more than wheat in ordinary years. With grain high, as it certainly will be next season, potatoes will continue to sell at high rates after the next crop comes to perfection. Farmers should make a note of this in time for spring operations. Let them plant largely. The crop will be a paying one. [N. Y. Tribune.

Guano on Potatoes.

Good Peruvian guano is one of the best known manures for wheat, always increasing the yield. Wheat, however, generally does not command price enough to make the application profitable. The comparative price of potatoes is usually much higher than wheat, and hence it is probable if guano will benefit the potato, its use would be profitable. To test this point, H. C. Ives, Esq., made the following experiment. He planted four acres of potatoes, the soil and treatment being the same, except that on two acres 600 pounds of Peruvian guano were sown broadcast, previous to drawing out the furrows for planting.

As soon as the plants were visible, the guanoed ones exhibited a richer, darker hue than the others, and continued to grow better throughout the summer.

The potatoes were dug the last week in October, and accurately measured. On the unguanoed two acres there were 238 bushels, making a difference of 86 bushels per acre. The guanoed potatoes are much the largest, with scarcely a small one among them. The guano cost in New York 2 1-2 cents per pound; freight, breaking the lumps, sifting and sowing it, would make its cost on the land, 3 cents per pound, or $9 per acre. For this $9 eighty-six bushels of potatoes were obtained.

On another part of the farm, Mr. Ives made another experiment to ascertain which was the best mode of applying the guano. The potatoes were planted in hills; one part had the guano sown boadcast, as in the first case; on the other, the guano was applied in the hill, placing the guano immediately over the potato, separating them with a little soil, as it is known that immediate contact is injurious to the set. The potatoes with guano in the hill was much better than where it was sown broadcast. Four rows left unguanoed were not more than half as good as where guano was applied.

The Clean Home.

What a beautiful sight a clean home is! I am going to talk a little to my readers about one that is very clean and neat; and I hope they will admire it so much, as to try and make their own (if they ever have one) as much like it as possible.

My sister and myself once called at a cottage in the village to inquire after a man who we were told was ill. It so happened that we did not know the family, but when we heard that the man was ill, and unable to work, we stopped to make inquiries. On opening the door, I shall never forget what pleasure we felt. They were at tea. The cloth on the table was snow-white, the cups and saucers bright and clean, and the loaf, the morsel of butter on another plate, the knife and the spoons were just as clean too. The husband's shirt, just ironed, was airing at the fire, and was as snowy as the table-cloth. The whole kitchen was so clean, the chairs, dresser, clock-case, &c., shone so brightly, and every thing had an air of so much neatness, that our first words were words of delight at such a scene. The poor man had been out of work some time, and they had two or three little children, yet the wife could not be dirty or untidy, and the very scanty food they possessed was served up comfortably. The man looked quite happy and contented under his trial; he seemed better pleased with a clean tea-table than a dirty, brawling beer-house, and smiled with pleasure at the praise we could so well bestow on his wife's good management. To something my sister said, he replied, "I never have come home to an untidy house, ma'am, since I've been married. I do not know what a dirty house is." What a happy thing it would be for every husband to be able to say this!

A Tragical Tale.

A most tragical tale is told of the sufferings of three soldiers of a detachment of the 69th regiment, now stationed at Tortola, and a black man, who got into a boat, the soldiers with the intention of deserting, and getting over to Crab Island, and thence as opportunity offered to America. After awhile, the wind arising, they were driven out of their course, and so remained in the open boat for several days, without food or water. At length one of the soldiers proposed to draw lots that one should be killed to furnish food for the others. They did so, and the lot fell upon Thomas Buckley, one of the soldiers, who forthwith bound up his arm, and opened a vein to bleed himself to death; one of the others and the black man sucked his blood, and afterward went raving mad, and jumped into the sea. Buckley also died; and there remained only one soldier out of the party in the boat, Wm. Lennon, who threw the dead body into the sea, lashed the helm and left himself to his fate. He had not tasted any of Buckley's blood, because, according to his own statement, he had felt a scruple at doing so, as he had been his comrade. After eleven days' drifting the boat was driven on the coast of St. Domingo, and the coast guard found the survivor, and after giving him some refreshments carried him to Jacmel to the English Consul, before whom he made relation of the facts as above, and he was sent back to Turtola in the steamer.

HERCULANEUM.—M. Bonucci, director of Herculaneum, has published the drawing and the ground-plan of a Greek tomb at Canusium, (Canosa,) erected during the best period of Greek Asia. Canusium was in its glory about 400 years before Christ, and the objects found in the funeral mansions of this city fully bear out the fame of their age. The building described by Bonucci consists of a vestibule which opens into nine surrounding apartments. It is constructed of tufa rock, and the chambers all painted with red, black, and yellow fresco decorations of a panel character, simple and subservient to architectural demands. In each of them were found vases, glass vessels, carved ivory, terra cottas, &c.; in one the complete furniture of a Greek tomb. The building, from an inscription on a wall, had evidently been entered by the Romans. M. Bonucci is preparing an elaborate report of the Necropolis of Canosa.

FATTENING POULTRY.—Mr. C. Jackson, of Allegheny County, Pa., says he keeps his fattening poultry in a warm, quiet room, one with glass windows, with shutters facing the South:—

"I vary the food constantly, never giving the same twice successively. Small potatoes boiled, boiled oats and Indian meal, a piece of cooked meat suspended from the rafters always accessible, milk to drink, and water fresh every day, a heap of gravel, one of ashes, and some charcoal, are my means of making poultry ready for the market in two weeks from the time they are put up to fatten. If longer than this time is required, there must be some mistake in the management. It should be recollected that the sooner meat is put on a fattening animal, whether a steer or chicken, the more tender it is. I place before my poultry all the materials for fattening themselves, tempt their appetites by giving them variety, and keep them quiet and comfortable, as I have alluded to. It is well known that the digestive process is sooner and easier finished during a state of rest. A chicken should have nothing to worry it, no anxiety of mind. Could they anticipate their latter end and the reasons for our supplying them with the dainties of the land, they would be held very uneasy, and I make it a point to keep all such information from them."

A YANKEE ON HIS TRAVELS.—It is related—and the fact seems tolerably well established—that an American, who made the tour of Europe, nobody knows how—once arrived in Alexandria, and announced his intention of proceeding to the First Cataract, there and back, for the sum of £5 sterling. Every one laughed at him—for even in those days a boat cost at least £20 a month, and ten weeks was considered a short time for the journey. Our economical traveler had not boasted, however, of what he was unable to perform. He invested a part of his capital in the purchase of a barrel of meal, determining to live simply on that substance diluted in Nile water, and went in tattered garments on board a boat bound for the upper country in quest of grain. How he managed to make himself understood, we cannot say. Probably the captain believed that his intellects were unsound, and therefore respected him. At any rate, by being useful on the voyage, by sitting at the rope of the mainsail in squally weather, by using a pole now and then, not objecting to pull an oar, and singing "Yankee Doodle" when the labors of the day were over, he made himself so agreeable, and consequently was himself so pleased, that, on his return, with a complete knowledge of Philœ, Thebes, and Dendera, he declared, as he finished his last mess of porridge, that in his way only could the Nile, be "done" with any amount of profit. We would not recommend persons unaccustomed to the backwoods to make the experiment.

SUBSTITUTE FOR PAPIER MACHE.—P. Warren, of Shodwell, England, patentee.—Straw, such as that of wheat or oats, is cut into short pieces by a machine, and is then passed between crushing rollers, or it may be ground between stones with a little water to keep it moist. When well ground, so as to break up all its knots, it is boiled in an iron kettle in a strong solution of potash and soda lye until it is reduced to a soft mass; the time required to effect this depends greatly on the quality of the straw. After this it is placed in the common rag engine used in paper mills and reduced to pulp. After this it is partially dried, when it may be rolled into sheets or molded in molds. The sheets or the molded article thus formed are then dipped into a solution of glue or oil, and they are afterwards baked in an oven similar to that employed in the manufacture of papier mache articles. Pigments may be introduced into the mass for giving it any color. The sheets or molded articles can be japanned, painted, and varnished, and the molded articles may be inlaid with shell, etc. This is simply the substitution of straw, for making papier mache, in place of paper.

AN INDIA RUBBER WASHING MACHINE.—There is now on exhibition in Cincinnati an invention for washing clothes, which is represented as being as similar to the operation of the washerwoman's hands while sweating over a wash-tub as the laws of mechanics will allow. The nature of the invention consists in constructing two rubbers, which are secured on arms suspended from two standards; one of the rubbers is secured to the lower end of one arm while the other is suspended to a similar arm secured to the main one by a hinge which allows the rubbers to be drawn together or apart at pleasure. The rubbers act so as to rub the cloth, to be washed, between them and fluted wash boards placed under them, one of which is stationary and the other movable—sliding—being moved by a treadle operated by the foot, to draw the cloth through regularly, to present new surfaces to be rubbed. The movable rubbers are of vulcanized India rubber, and are made to be of a nature like the human hand—something like a cushion, whereby the clothes are well rubbed, with as little injury as possible to their texture.

TRADE OF BOSTON.—The Calcutta trade alone at present employs more than sixty ships, many of them first-class clippers of the largest capacity, and they all load directly at Calcutta for Boston which is the great mart and emporium for East India goods. Occasionally there is an arrival at Philadelphia and New York from Calcutta, but only rarely is a cargo of Calcutta goods thrown upon those markets. Boston has also most of the Padang, Batavia, Manilla and Sumatra trade, and a large proportion of the Chilian and Sandwich Island trade, so much so that at the Sandwich Island ports the only place that is known in the United States is Boston. The China trade, although principally carried on by Boston merchants and Boston ships, mostly centers at New York, and of the large fleet now on its way from China ports to the United States with teas, only one ship is bound to Boston! REASONS FOR SABBATH-KEEPING.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I am requested to forward to you, for publication, the following summary of the reasons for the change of my views respecting the Sabbath, and why I view the seventh day of the week to be the only true Bible Sabbath.

1st. The Sabbath is spoken of in Genesis as a memorial of the creation, and in Exodus as already existing. Several miracles were wrought to ratify its authority, and enforce the obligation of the people to observe it, and encourage their obedience. When some of them rebelled, "the Lord said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?"—clearly implying, that the Sabbath had long been instituted, that the people had wickedly refused to keep it, and were still inclined to do so.

2d. And when, afterward, the law of ten commandments was given, written and engraven in stone, by the finger of God, (the law concerning the Sabbath being the fourth, on the first table,) it was commanded to "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy," &c. The command to remember it, supposes it had been instituted some time before; and the reason given, why the seventh day should be kept, shows that the Sabbath was instituted at the finishing of the work of creation. "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." Ex. 20. 8—11. To sanctify and hallow a day, must mean to set it apart to a sacred and holy use. Thus it appears that the Sabbath designated in the fourth commandment was the seventh day of the week, in regular succession from the creation; for, if we suppose that man might have lost the day, Jehovah certainly could not; and He tells us, that we should keep that day holy, because he rested on that day of the week, and sanctified and blessed it. But we have pretty good evidence, that up to that time the day was not entirely lost among men.

3d. But was not the day lost or changed in their frequent apostasies, and the dispersions of the tribes of Israel, during the time from their coming into the land of Canaan to the coming of Christ? This seems impossible; for though there were great corruptions and innovations introduced during those times, yet there was always a pious and godly remnant preserved, who vigilantly guarded against and detected them. Accordingly, when Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, ordained a feast on a different day from that which God had appointed, "in the fifteenth day of the eighth month, even in the month which he had devised of his own heart," it was numbered among the aggravating sins of his reign. 1 Kings 12: 25. And again, in Dan. 7: 25, it is said that the little horn (which we take to be the New Testament Antichrist) "should speak great words against the Most High, and think to change times and laws. Thus it is evident that the changing of times and laws was considered and treated as a heinous sin under the Old Testament, and sure to be reproved by the faithful; and the change of the weekly Sabbath from the seventh to some other day could not have taken place without being made known. But of such change we have no proof, either human or divine. We therefore conclude there was no change down to the coming of Christ.

5th. That it was the seventh day of the week that was kept as a Sabbath by our Lord in the days of his flesh, and by his disciples, and the Jewish people generally, will not be denied by any one. For none will pretend that there was any other weekly Sabbath until after the resurrection of Christ. And this was the Sabbath uniformly observed by the Apostles and primitive Christians. Luke 23: 55, 56. It is said that those good women, who came with him from Galilee, and witnessed the crucifixion and interment of Christ, "returned, and rested the Sabbath-day according to the commandment." Was this the seventh day? Matt. 28: 1—"In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene." The first-day of the week followed the Sabbath. We read in the Acts of the Apostles of their meeting frequently in the Jewish synagogues, on the Sabbath, for preaching and worship, and this, I presume, none will deny, was the seventh-day Sabbath. We know it is often said, that this they did in condescension to Jewish prejudices, and only to avail themselves of an opportunity to preach the Gospel. But this is easier said than proved. And it is worthy of remark, that the Jews never accused the disciples of that day of substituting a new day for the Sabbath, in violation of the law of God; which they certainly would, if they had adopted the first in place of the seventh day.

Thus far it appears that we have a Sabbath explicitly established, by the authority of the great Jehovah, and regulaly handed down from the creation—and this Sabbath is the seventh and last day of the week.

But is not the first day set apart for the Christian Sabbath, in place of the seventh? To this I answer—1st. It is nowhere called a Sabbath, but, in contradistinction, is called the first day. No explicit command to that effect can be found in the Scriptures, and it is a question whether a mere example, without a precept, forms an authoritative rule? The example of wise and good men should doubtless be treated with great defference; but does it constitute an absolute law? But, 2d, the first day as a Sabbath has not example for its support. For though we have account of the Apostles having several meetings on the first day of the week, we have no evidence that it was by any public appointment, or that they met expressly for worship, and it was in each case in the evening, except that at Troas, (Acts 20: 7,) and even there the exercise of worship was held in the evening, and continued till daybreak the next morning. And there is no evidence, in either case, that they abstained from their common avocations what time they were not at meeting. And the construction given to Psalm 118: 23, and 1 Cor. 16: 2, and Rev. 1: 10, is merely conjectural, and proves nothing conclusive.

Finally, I come to this conclusion, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," or we have none by divine authority. But we are not prepared to give up an institution plainly given, and abundantly enforced by our Creator, so well calculated for the welfare of man and beast in this world, and the eternal happiness of man in the world to come. Why were the ten commandments written and engraven in stone, if not to signify their permenancy and perpetuity? They surely cannot be numbered among the hand-writing of ordinances which were blotted out, and which were against us, and contrary to us. Who ever heard of an engraving in stone being blotted out? But the law of the Sabbath was one of them, and stands on the same ground with the other nine. And though the law might be said to be against us, as it condemns the world, yet it was, or is calculated, in the nature of it, for the greatest good of the universe, and particularly the Sabbath law, has ever been held by good people as an invaluable blessing to the world.

But some have contended that the whole were abolished by the death of Christ; and that nine were re-enacted afterwards, and the fourth left out. This notion is so palpably absurd and contradictory to the scriptures, that it does not merit a refutation. If this is true, then there was a time (and how long they do not tell us) when it was not unlawful to have some other God before Jehovah; or to make as many images as the people pleased; or to take the name of God in vain; when it was not unlawful to steal, to bear false witness, and commit adultery! For, if the law forbidding and condemning these things was abolished, it could not be unlawful to do them. It is horrible to think of such a state of things existing for a minute; and yet, if it ever took place, it must have been for months or years. But our Lord saith, "I came not to destroy the law, or the prophets, but to fulfill them;" and Paul, "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid." To abolish the ten commands would be to absolve the world from their allegiance to Jehovah.

But, say many, we believe the principle of the law concerning the Sabbath remains unalterable; which is, that we shall keep a seventh part of time, without reference to any particular day. Will such persons permit me to ask, whether it would not be in accordance with the above principle, should an individual, or a church, set apart the second, third, or fourth day of the week, for a Sabbath, instead of the first, or keep two or three days in succession, and pass over as many weeks when it suited their business better? But this would make great confusion, and defeat the good design of the Sabbath. And do we not think the Allwise foresaw this, and therefore fixed on a particular day? But "it is impossible to determine at this late day, which is the last day of the week." It is equally impossible to ascertain which is the first day, as every one can see.

It is often asked, how the Sabbath came to be changed from the seventh to the first day? But we have not time nor room to answer this and many other inquiries. We have been far more lengthy than was intended. We would barely say, that the Romish Church says it was done by the authority of the Pope, and also that the institution of infant baptism was by his authority. And this seems to agree with what is foretold of him, for it is said "he should exalt himself above all that is called God, or worshiped, and think to change times and laws."

I am aware, that some may impute my change of views on this subject to the imbecility of old age, I being in the eighty-second year of my life. But be that as it may, I have endeavored to be governed wholly by the Scriptures, and a regard to the truth and law of God, without fear of consequences. And what I have written, has been in tender and fervent love, and veneration and respect, for my dear brethren and sisters, who are yet unconvinced of what I believe to be the truth. May God graciously incline us all to stand in the way, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and find rest to our souls. ROSWELL MEARS.

THE SUNDAY IN HAYTI.

The Sunday in Hayti is not only the busiest day in the week, but presents more scenes characteristic of the people than any other day. You are awaked at the earliest dawn by the booming of cannon on the fort. This is the call for the various military companies to collect at their several stations, and prepare for a general parade and review by the Emperor. Soon the streets are all alive with bustle and confusion. The various companies are dashing by on horseback or marching to the music of a band. They assemble at first in the large yard in front of and around the government house, the residence of Soulouque, where, amid the strains of martial music, various evolutions and exercises are gone through with, the significance of which I could never understand, as the Emperor never makes his appearance. After an hour or more spent here, they march to a large, beautiful plain, lying back of the government house, where they prepare for a review by the Emperor. His majesty, Faustin the First, with not more than half a million of subjects, has a standing army of not far from 20,000, about twice the number of our own. I think I have seen half of this number at a Sunday morning review. They are formed into a hollow square, and after the proper officers have made the circuit of the lines, to see that all is in order, a company of officers is dispatched to inform the Emperor, whose approach is announced and greeted with an almost deafening salute of martial music, the roar and din of which is continued, while he, accompanied by his ministers of state, officers and guards, rides rapidly around the entire line to the point of starting, where he makes a halt, and the entire army passes in review before him. This done, he makes the circuit of the city. [Putnam's Magazine.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

From a private letter of Ira W. Utter, dated Olympia, Thurston County, Washington Territory, Dec. 18, 1853, we copy the following account of the soil, productions, &c., of that region.

The emigrants who have come to Puget Sound this season by the new road across the Cascade Mountains, speak very highly of the lands upon White River and along the range of the Cascade upon both sides. This land being so far in the interior, settlers have not taken many "claims" there, choosing to come upon the shores of the Sound. Yet this land, upon the west side of the Mountains, is not more than twenty or thirty miles from the Sound—a short distance from one of the best water communications in the world.

The land on Puget Sound is generally of a light, sandy soil, with now and then a river bottom, as the bordering lands are called, which is very good, but flooded in the winter season. Now and then may be found a little prairie land, but it is scarce. The country has been discovered rather too soon for a naturally rich soil. The vegetables and trees, however, grow to such an enormous size, that one's reputation for truth might be questioned, if he should attempt to give a description of them.

You may wish to know something of the animals, insects, and vegetables, which are natural to this country. There are a few wild cattle upon the prairie lands of the interior. There are no sheep in this section at present, but some have been brought into the adjoining Territory of Oregon. The country abounds with wild geese and ducks at this season, of the year which make the Sound and Lakes their winter home. Of most kinds of birds, I think there is a scarcity. I have seen none of the sweet singing birds so common at home, such as the robbin, the swallow, and the lark. Wild game, deer, bears, and elk, are quite plenty—bears mostly back toward the mountains. The honey-bee is not a native of this country, and it is doubted whether they could be kept here, there not being sufficient extremes of heat and cold to make them provide food for the winter. Yet this is a question to be settled by a longer experience. Flowers upon which they could subsist are plenty. We have a species of yellow wasp or hornet, that is quite troublesome in the summer season, intruding itself upon every one's notice, even claiming a share of the sweet things provided for the table, and replying to any remonstrance by a painful sting. There are no venomous reptiles known here. The Indians have a tradition, that the Great Spirit has promised that no rattlesnake shall be allowed West of "Edgar's Rock"—a point beyond the Cascade.

Puget Sound abounds in fish, and is becoming one of the greatest fishing grounds on the Pacific. The salmon caught here sell at a much higher rate in San Francisco than any others in market. Codfish are taken in small quantities by the Indians in the Straits of Fuca, and this business will probably increase and become profitable. Clams abound upon the shores of these waters. They resemble the round clams of the East, but grow to a much larger size. I have seen some measuring from ten to sixteen inches by eight and ten. They are very plenty. Oysters are small, and not plenty on the Sound. Shoal Water Bay, in this Territory, near the Columbia, is the great oyster depôt, yet these are small and need attention and time to make them equal to those of the Eastern coast. There are a few vessels engaged in the oyster trade between this Bay and San Francisco.

Potatoes are grown here by the Indians to some extent—whether natural to the country, or introduced by the Hudson's Bay Company, I am not able to say. Berries appear very plenty and natural to the soil. They are of almost every imaginable kind, many of which are not known in the Atlantic States. The grapes of this country differ much from any thing of the kind I ever saw before—the vine or bush being not over six or eight inches high, with the grapes in little clusters on the under sides. Grafts of all kinds of fruit grow very quick to a bearing condition. Horticulture has not engaged the attention of the people as yet.

The healthfulness of this portion of the country can not be questioned, as far as fevers and epidemic diseases are concerned. A consumptive can not escape that disease by flying here, any more than to other portions of the seacoast.

Lumbering is the principal business at present on the Sound; and, considering the number of inhabitants, brings a large sum of money into the country. To show you more conclusively how things stand, I will give you the census, as reported by the United States Marshal of the Territory, showing the counties, inhabitants, lumber, &c:—

Counties.	Inhabitants.	Voters.
Island	195	80
Jefferson	189	68
King	170	111
Pierce	513	276
Thurston	996	381
Pacific	152	61
Lewis	616	269
Clarke	1134	466
Total,	3965	1682

There are thirty-one saw mills in the Territory in full operation, to say nothing of the many that are in progress of erection. They turn out, at a low estimate, the handsome amount of forty-five million feet of lumber per annum. This, at the ordinary price of $25 per thousand at the mill, foots up the comfortable sum of a million and a quarter of dollars annually.

Of Oregon, I can say but little at present; but I intend visiting the Territory, and also the White River and some other rivers in this Territory, when I will give you a more complete account. Much fever and ague is reported on the Willamette and Columbia rivers.

From the German of Johann Martin Miller.

THE CONTENTED MAN.

Why need I strive or sigh for wealth?
It is enough for me,
That Heaven hath sent me strength and health,
A spirit glad and free;
Grateful these blessings to receive,
I sing my hymn at morn and eve.

On some, what floods of riches flow!
House, herds, and gold have they—
Yet life's best joys they never know,
But fret their hours away;
The more they have, they seek increase—
Complaints and cravings never cease.

A vale of tears this world they call;
To me it seems so fair,
It countless pleasures hath for all,
And none denied a share.
The little birds, on new-fledged wing,
And insects, revel in the spring.

For love of us, hills, woods, and plains,
In beauteous hues are clad,
And birds sing far and near, sweet strains,
Caught up by echoes glad,
"Rise," sings the lark, "your tasks to ply;"
The nightingale sings "lullaby."

And when the golden sun goes forth,
And all like gold appears,
When bloom o'erspreads the glowing earth,
And fields are ripening ears—
I think these glories that I see,
My kind Creator made for me.

Then loud I thank the Lord above,
And say, in joyful mood;
His love, indeed, is father's love,
He wills to all men good.
Then let me ever grateful live,
Enjoying all he deigns to give.

CHRISTIAN COLONIES IN THE WEST.

The Independent recently printed an advertisement which had in view a Christian Colony in the West. Thereupon a correspondent took that advertisement as a text for the following valuable sermon:—

The tide of emigration westward, whether for good or for ill, can no more be stayed than the course of the gulf-stream. The late census returns furnish proof or the general health of the western States. Owners of stocks valued at a hundred millions of dollars invite the enterprising to make a home on new soil, to subserve the interests of both capitalist and producer. The last year, the present, and the next, will span the prairies and groves, hitherto almost without an inhabitant, with more than a thousand miles of railroad; so that the hardships of frontier life shall no more be brought to mind by the multitudes of pioneers "ticketed through" to the cheapest and most fertile lands on the continent. Landholders in the East are buying out the small proprietors; and while the avocation of the farmer is yearly becoming more profitable and honorable, rich soil westward, only a two-days journey distant, will be purchased at $5 the acre, rather than inferior soil eastward for $50. Economical considerations, combined with the adventurous spirit and modern facilities for traveling, will secure the transfer of a numerous people to new homes on the course of "the star of empire."

Not those alone of undefined opinions, and wanting position in the home of their youth, will change their abode. Churches not weak are to suffer a severe depletion. A Presbyterian minister in western New York writes me: "I am almost discouraged; my most enterprising men, and the very best families, are going West." A letter received last week from a pastor in Berkshire county, Mass., contains the following passage: "The course of business is such in our country, as to be steadily draining the very life-blood out of these mountain districts. We are steadily losing ground, and see no practicable way of helping it. Almost all of our enterprising youth of both sexes leave us when they reach maturity, and our best families are emigrating to the West."

How, then, should such persons go West? Observation in the West, and a careful study of the whole question, prompts this answer: In companies, with persons of congenial moral and religious sentiments, embracing mechanics, and pecuniary ability to make the school and the Church paramount and attractive institutions from the outset. To name the reasons for this opinion is enough. It will contribute to the protection of those emigrating. In the northwest, there are thousands of families lost to the Church by removal. They have made a home distant from their own denomination, and are seldom in church; or they are surrounded by denominations with whom they do not choose to unite while there is hope in the future of enjoying their own. "Hope deferred" relaxes exertion; and soon the once fair and flourishing professor is seen relapsing in his principles, and with perverted taste, conformed to the irreligious habits of frontier life. Observation has proved, that those who are strangers, and do not in their new home from the first avow their religious convictions, may never do it. Their excuse, "that they find nothing in the Church as it used to be at home," may not be valid, while their removal from the presence of congenial friends will prove the shipwreck of their principles.

"My people are so scattered!" is the mournful expression of many a home missionary: for well they know, that a monthly hearing of the Word ordinarily fails to secure the fruits which the pastoral relation contemplates. This is the condition of thousands of families, which can not at present be remedied, since a change of home is not so easily made, and there is a lack of ministers even to supply the organized churches.

If it be said that the Christian should be a light everywhere, and as leaven among the ungodly, the position will not be denied; but the facts are, the few yield to the many, and a single Christian family or a few poor families can effect but little in a community where there is a strong preorganized irreligious sentiment. A weak society may be formed with the best of principles, but from its pecuniary dependence, only to be led and perverted by designing men, to the dishonor of religion, and as numerous localities evidence, inflicting a blow on a given denomination, from which it will require years to recover.

The Bishops of Ireland complain that one-half the Catholics emigrating to America are lost to the Church; and having studied the causes of this loss, Rome prefers that her adherents should dwell near to the priest and the Church in poverty, rather than with plenty and distant from the Church. Protestants may learn from their enemies the methods in order to preservation and power. A lesson may be known from towns in Vermont, New York, Ohio, and Illinois, which were settled by a heterogeneous people, distracted by numerous sects, and which still lack that absorbing element of influence which, in towns adjacent, settled by congenial spirits, has sustained schools and seminaries, and an able ministry, all contributing to a still greater assimilation.

ORGANIZED EMIGRATION becomes a Christian duty, if a new home is sought. There is a natural proclivity to the strong side, and a horror of minorities. Bad men in new neighborhoods, in the presene of strong Christian men, have often given up controversy, and from motives of peace and policy, have placed themselves within the reach of the minister's voice, which has eventuated in their conversion.

In a time of rebellion, government is respected according to the number and character of the force sent to quell the outbreak; and the force and position of Christians in the frontier States determines their influence on the all-abounding errors, and whether Christ's triumph shall be early and complete, or delayed indefinitely. Government erects the light-house at such a height, and with a given number of lamps. Fitful, chance lights on the shore will not suffice in the nights of darkness and storm; no more will single Christians, mostly poor, and of necessity secular in their pursuits, scattered through the West, effect that which requires to be done by a combination of influence. If Christians, then, would unite to this end, "the solitary place shall be glad for them," and the report would go out through the land, "there are the profits of godliness and conquests for Christ."

There are social and material bearings of this question, which deserve a brief mention. We are made for society; society is not "got up tc order," like a military company for an emergency. But persons with a common aim, of the same faith, and with a free will, embarking together, will find a variety of pleasing correspondences in a new home where all are called to the same trials, and inspired with kindred hopes. We remember the glowing countenances of our fathers, rehearsing the story of days when, with a brother's spirit, they laid the foundations which are now justly their children's pride and joy. There trials we need not know in full, borne, as we may be, by steam to the prairies, long smiling with invitations for the stranger; but enough remains of toil and devotion to the generations that come after, to perpetuate friendships through prospered years to old age. Constructing a social and religious fabric, and not complaining over that which can not be remedied, is the proper employment, and contributes to real affinity, happiness, and strength of character.

The economies of this question are evident. Where there are numbers, the pecuniary burdens of the Church and school are divided, and every valued institution rendered really more valuable. Lands adjacent to the Christian colonies are held in the market at a much higher price than those in the vicinity of a medley class of people.

A number of families in one company may purchase merchandize and materials for house-building at much lower rates than the immigrant alone; and public spirit, in the laying-out of grounds, and in ornamental culture, will effect at a little expense that which individual enterprise could not achieve.

Persons with a common interest, settled by the stream of water, or near a coal-bed, can with economy, establish those factories which every consideration of political economy requires in the West. The farmers, uniting their funds, can purchase patent reapers, and mowers, and other great labor-saving inventions of this age, yet beyond the reach of the mass of isolated farmers. Stock and wool growers, at a small cost to each, can secure the best bloods, and such advantages from their introduction as are now only known in a few wealthy localities.

We forbear to enumerate advantages further. If it be said that some may leave the company, we answer, their vacancy will invite good rather than bad men. If failures are in memory, the answer is, not on virgin soil, in a free State, in this day of railroads.

THE JEWISH SABBATH.

It is unlawful to ride on horseback or in a carriage—to walk more than a mile from their dwellings—to transact business of any kind—to meddle with any tool—to write—to play upon any musical instrument—to bathe—to comb the hair—and even to carry a pin in their clothes which is unnecessary. These and a great many others are complied with by the most rigid. There is one command in the law of Moses to which all Jews most scrupulously adhere, "Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the Sabbath day." (Exodus xxxv, 3.) Consequently, they never light a fire, lamp, or candle on the Sabbath day, nor eat food prepared on that day—all must be done on Friday. As it is impossible to spend the Sabbath in cold climates without fire or light, the Jewish families who keep servants make it a point to have a Gentile in their service to do these things, and among the humbler classes a number of families generally unite in securing the services of a Gentile neighbor for the day. Nothing would wound the conscience of a Jew more than to be under the necessity of putting fuel on the fire or snuffing his candles on the Sabbath. [British Jew.

VALUE OF RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

A public dinner was lately given to the friends and supporters of the "Patriot" and "British Banner" newspapers. The following remarks by the Lord Mayor of London, who presided on that occasion, deserve attention from the supporters of religious papers generally:—

"Our religious societies are very much indebted to the Patriot, British Banner, and other newspapers, for the nature and amount of the prosperity which they now happily enjoy. What is still more, religion itself is greatly advanced. We entertain no exaggerated notions on the subject of religious newspapers; but we are well persuaded, that it is a great advantage to society to have religious newspapers, conducted upon the principle of excluding everything that is inimical to religion, and of promoting those aims and objects which flow from and are supported by religion. We deprecate, rather than encourage, the publication in newspapers of long dissertations on theological subjects, which, however valuable, are better fitted for the pages of a magazine; but as I have just said, I see no reason whatever, why not only our own newspapers, but all others, should not be conducted on religious principles. On the contrary, such principles ought to underlie all our acts, whether private or public, and especially all that is done for the benefit of our country and the world. The question, then, comes to this—What more can be done by us, to place these papers, already so successful and influential, in a position of still greater influence and prosperity? If the principle with which I started be a correct one—that these journals do lend very effectual aid in the promotion of truth, benevolence, and religion—it becomes the duty of every one of us, I repeat, to do all that we can to extend their means of influencing the minds of our countrymen, and the current of public events. I will not now go into details, because I have no wish to turn this fraternal, social meeting, into a purely business affair; but I very greatly desire that all now present should separate, with not only an inclination, but a determination, to redouble their exertions in co-operating with the Patriot and the British Banner. The editors, I think, deserve our encouragemet. Week after week they are laboring to enlighten the public mind, to correct public opinion where it is wrong, and to diffuse right views. The editors, then, I say, who are laboring so zealously and continually for this object, deserve our support and encouragement, even though they may not in every instance take the same views as we ourselves. You will hardly ever find that those censors who are sometimes so loud in denouncing any little deviation, on the part of the editors of a newspaper, from the principles which they themselves hold, or from the course on any public question which they think to be the correct one, have exerted themselves in the least degree to extend its circulation, or done anything to procure for it an increased measure of support. I hope, then, that you will all think with me, that we ought not to allow the editors to persevere amid every form of discouragement, without having our cordial sympathies and our zealous help."

THE BIBLE IN HOTELS.

We often hear it said, "Why are we so profuse in placing the Scriptures in the hands of all persons, and wherever a resting-place can be found for them? Many who obtain them from you could purchase them if they chose, and they will only be desecrated in hotels." We give the following facts as a reply to such objections:—

"An individual with his family left this State, to find, as he thought, a more profitable pursuit in the South. Business called him northward during the prevalence of the yellow fever. He was assured before he left his new home, that there was no danger. The crisis was passed, and there were circumstances which the physician in attendance on the family thought would protect them from attack. The father had but reached the end of his journey when he was telegraphed that the mother of his children was dead, and then that every member of his family was swept away by the destroyer. 'Not one left,' as he said, 'upon whom his affections could rest in sad remembrance of those who were gone.' But to the point. On hearing of his afflicted state, the writer of this immediately called at his hotel to see him. He was shown to his room. There he found the disconsolate father, previously careless of the Word of God and his soul's welfare, with the Bible—the Bible—the Bible furnished the hotel by our Society—on the table before him. He had none himself, neither would he have asked for one; but there he found the Scriptures before him, to which he could look for consolation. His heart was touched by his afflictions. We prayed together; and he was left with the Bible, to find the comfort its promises afford."

Another incident: "Two persons, among the many who fled from New Orleans to escape the dreadful disease by which it was desolated, stopped at one of our hotels. The Bible, placed there by the benevolence of its friends, met their views, and its label directed them where to make a purchase of one if destitute. The ladies called at the depository to supply themselves, perhaps for the first time in their lives, with the Word of God. A little interesting conversation ensued, and the impression was left upon the mind of the writer, that the hotel Bible was as bread cast upon the waters, to be found in due time."

Such are the replies we prefer making to those who may yet have to feel the expansive benevolence which "God sheds abroad in the heart." [Bible Society Record.

SUPPLY OF DESTITUTE CHURCHES.

The ministerial destitution of so many of our churches often starts the inquiry, 'What shall be done to remedy the matter?' If death, or some other providence, has removed a pastor, immediately the church looks abroad for some one to go in and out before the people. Some other church is enjoying the labors of a faithful minister, and towards him, perhaps, all eyes are turned. Plans are set on foot to secure his services. He is written to, waited upon by committees, tempted with the offer of a larger salary, flattered, and made, at last, to believe that he is just the man for the destitute post. He supposes that duty requires him to yield; and so the church which he has long been serving is made destitute, that the other may be supplied.

Thus the work of change goes on, but for the main trouble no remedy is found. Indeed, not unfrequently the trouble is increased by this course. For it does not follow, from the fact that a minister has been eminently successful in one field, that he will be so in another. It is not by human might, or power, that he is successful anywhere. He is successful just as far as the Spirit of God concurs with and blesses his labors, and no farther. Now, if he abandons a field to which God has appointed him—that is, one which, by some clear and unmistakable leadings of Providence, has been designated as the place in which he ought to live and labor—and enters upon another, in the idea that he can secure God's blessing let him go where he may, he may find himself mistaken. He may find that in his new field he is left to labor alone. He may find that God is not with him, as he once was. He may find such a mutual want of adaptation between himself and the people, as precludes his usefulness in a great degree. Thus, while the man himself is transferred to a new field, his efficiency as a minister is not; and the practical effect is much the same as if one of the already diminished ministerial corps had been struck from the list.

We are not now arguing against an occasional change of the pastoral relation. Circumstances may sometimes not only justify it, but imperiously require it. A minister may, sometimes, for good and sufficient reasons, seek another field of labor; and a church may, sometimes, justifiably, endeavor to secure the services of a minister, who is preaching acceptably somewhere else.

But it has occurred to us, whether the practice of looking abroad—that is, to some other church—for help, whenever a destitution has been created, does not indicate a departure of the Holy Spirit. Is it not according to Scripture, that a church, constituted after the divine model, is completely furnished within itself with the gifts necessary to its growth and efficiency? If so, when a prophet—teacher—or expounder of the Scriptures—has been removed, the church is not, in ordinary cases, to look abroad for another, but to its own members. And if, among them, one is found competent to sustain the office of instructor and pastor, upon him the office should be conferred. For it may reasonably be supposed, other things being equal, that such is the mind of the Holy Spirit. Otherwise, why was this member gifted for the work?

What church ever thinks of going abroad in quest of a deacon? To its own members resort is always had to fill vacancies in this office. Then why go abroad for other officers? If a minister may be called from one church to another, one would think that a good and efficient deacon might. Perhaps, if salaries were not concerned, the removals of ministers might be as rare as those of deacons.

It will be replied, however, that it is absolutely necessary to go abroad for a pastor, there appearing to be no one of the members qualified for the office. Very true. But is not this very necessity indicative of the absence of God's Spirit? Does it not show a sad decline from the purity and simplicity of the Apostolic age? If the Spirit of God were in our churches, creating those "diversities of gifts" and "differences of administrations" that marked the churches of primitive times, would there be any such necessity? We think this is a question for serious consideration.

Now, while we admit the justifiableness of resorting to other churches, on some occasions, for such ministerial gifts as a destitute church may stand in need of, we believe that, in most cases, the resort should be to fasting and prayer, in the confident expectation that the Head of the Church will interpose, and take away the necessity of calling some one from a field where he is already profitably occupied. In our own denomination this is imperatively demanded. Nothing else will prove an adequate remedy for the destitution we are suffering. Ministers may itinerate, and change their residences, but the trouble at large remains still. And unless our people can be made to feel the necessity of praying the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers, the trouble will continue. T. B. B.

THE NEBRASKA QUESTION.

The proposition before Congress, to organize Nebraska Territory under such provisions as will throw it open to Slavery, is every where being discussed, and finds but few advocates among the people at the North. There is reason to fear, however, that the stupendous iniquity will be consummated. The South, of course, is almost unanimous, in its favor, and there is always in Congress a large sprinkling of dough-faces and office-seekers, who can be bought or bullied into voting against freedom. Under such circumstances, it is important that northern feeling—which is in this case Christian feeling—should be so expressed as to tell in Congress. With this in view, one of the editors of the Independent makes the following suggestions :—

1. Let petitions be circulated in every school district, in every village and town, and as fast as a hundred names are got, let them be sent to Congress; and thus let every day's mail carry one, until a stream of petitions sets in. In this work American women can properly engage. This may incite those to action with whom they have influence; they may see to it that petitions are circulated, and do much toward it by their own services. Was there ever an occasion or a cause that should draw forth a woman's heart, if it be not this—the saving of countless of their own sex from the shameless degradation of a slavery which ignores marriage, and tramples under foot the tenderest and holiest ties of humanity. Schools of young men, and colleges, workmen in manufactories, and societies of every kind, might send petitions to Washington from their own members. In short, let every thing that has breath speak, so that it may be known at Washington, that gambling politicians do not represent the Northern sentiments.

2. Let documents be circulated among the people, the speeches of Chase, Seward, and Sumner. Let papers be prepared in each principal neighborhood, giving concisely the facts, and the future bearings of this step, to be issued in country papers, and in hand bills.

3. Let every man of any influence, write to his representative. It is not enough to sign petitions. Let there be thousands of private letters, asking them what they are doing to prevent this evil, and representing the home-interest which is felt.

4. There should promptly be called public meetings, great and small, all over the North, that men may kindle each other's zeal, strengthen each other's purposes, and give movement and majestic power to public sentiment.

5. The people should not wait until public men, great men, influential men, or any men, tell them to move. The people are competent to move of themselves. Wherever a heart beats in this cause, let that heart give its emotions utterance. Let poor men, unlettered men, mechanics and laborers; in short, the great industrial class—let them move with spontaneousness.

But whoever works, and whatever is done, it must be with promptness and vigor. No time is to be lost. The matter will be speedily settled in one way or another.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

From a letter of Eld. S. Carpenter, dated Shanghae, Nov. 27, 1853.

On the 2d inst. our Commissioner, Col Marshall, took his departure from this place, and was honored by a salute from the ship-of-war Saratoga. During his stay he showed to all that his sympathies were in favor of the falling Tartar Dynasty, which he labored to prop up. He was the means of saving the life of the Tautae when Shanghae was taken. But that mandarin, who humbly begged for his life, promising to retire from active opposition, has since become the open and most dreaded enemy of the insurgents in the city.

On the 7th of this month, about 100 Chinese were on their way to and almost opposite the foreign anchorage, when, in trying to pass the Imperial fleet, they were taken, and some of them immediately beheaded on the Tautae's ship, and so near us that several foreigners saw it; the remainder were reserved till next day, when they shared the same fate. They were coming, it is said, to join the insurgents in the city.

On the 6th inst., about twenty sail of the above-named fleet weighed anchor, and a few passed the foreign anchorage and opened a fire upon the stockades of the rebels on the river side, on the outskirts of the suburbs, which are still in the hands of the rebels. Their fire was so vigorously returned from the stockades, that they hastily retreated in disgrace.

The 10th inst. will be a memorable day in the annals of Shanghae. At about 8 o'clock A. M., the first division of about thirty sail of Canton and west coast piratical vessels, weighed anchor and passed the foreign shipping, directly in front of us, and within a few hundred yards of us. As soon as they cleared the foreign shipping, they opened a heavy fire upon the stockades; this was briskly returned, and one of their square-rigged vessels and two or three smaller ones, were disabled, and they made off. The cannonading was kept up briskly for about half an hour, and now and then a random shot sent a ball over into the foreign settlement. There were enough of these to prevent our viewing the action as deliberately as we otherwise should have done. One ball struck the ground very near us. At length the second division came up, and on clearing the foreign shipping commenced firing as the others had done; soon we discovered that two of their vessels were making directly for two foreign ships recently purchased and armed by the rebels, lying close by the stockades. That was a moment of intense interest. But the Imperialists had altogether the advantage. Not only were they ten times more numerous than the rebels, but each vessel had a man at the top of the mast, protected by a strong bull-skin tent fixed to the mast, and carrying a quantity of pots containing a composition of powder and some other ingredients. When they apply a match to these, and throw them upon the deck of a ship, they immediately explode, producing a vast quantity of gas and flame, in which it is said no breathing thing can live. Every one of these lorchas carried such a hideous appendage at the top of the mast. By such means the two foreign vessels of the rebels fell an easy prey to their enemy. Their crews plunged into the waters and made for shore, but some of them were overtaken and speared in the water, and among them one foreigner, who had left his neutrality and joined the rebels. This done, the firing was kept up till after noon, without being able, however, to take the stockades. But the imperialists before mid-day had set fire to the sububs a little further up, and there was a fearful conflagration. In the evening the scene was awfully and painfully sublime. The section traversed by the fire contained a great many wholesale establishments, as well as family residences, and furnished no small booty to the piratical warriors in the employ of the government. This wanton destruction of property would have been less anomalous, had it been the property of the rebels instead of belonging to loyal subjects. Thus in one day thousands of families were deprived of a home and of their property, by those who had come professedly to save them.

During the naval engagement on the east side, there was an attack also on the north and north-west sides of the city. The rebels designedly concealed themselves until a large number of imperialists approached the city walls, and a few of them had actually scaled them; when they arose and beheaded these, and opened a destructive fire upon those below, who retreated, it is said, with much quicker step than they approached. The number killed that day was supposed to be about three hundred.

On the evening of the 14th inst., it being a pleasant moonlight evening, Mrs. C. and I were walking out at about 9 o'clock, when we perceived a little unusual stir, and were immediately informed that there was some kind of a disturbance on the foreign ground. We had gone but a few steps further, when, at the corner of a street, we heard a bullet whizzing past and very near us. In a few moments volunteers were out, and an armed force landed from the ships of war, and the three hundred Imperialists, who had come upon the foreign ground armed, contrary to known rules, were driven off with the loss of five or six killed, and more than that number wounded. Their object in making this nocturnal visit is not certainly known.

The Imperial fleet remained at anchor a little above the city until the 17th inst., when with a light breeze and against the tide they made their way very slowly down again below the city and below the foreign shipping to their former anchorage. On their way they kept up a long-continued and heavy firing upon the stockades. It was astonishing that so much bluster should have had so little effect. Only four of the rebels were killed while managing their guns on the stockades; one of these was a boy much regretted by the rebels on account of his bravery.

On the 22d inst., having previously prepared a note addressed to the rebel chief, I took our washerman and went into the city again. I had not been in there since the 30th ult. I went directly to the Confucian Temple, where the rebel chief resides, but was told that he had "gone out"—a polite way, probably, of saying he was not to be seen. The highest officer I saw there was so overcome with opium, that it was with difficulty he could rise from his couch, or speak after he was on his feet. I then proceeded to our house, every one staring at me, and many wondering how I could get among them. I found Tong in usual good health, and upon my offering to get him out, he preferred to remain, for the safety of the house and furniture. If the Imperialists should succeed in retaking the city, there will probably be no small slaughter of the peaceable inhabitants. But I think there is little probability now that they will retake the city; so I did not insist upon Tong coming out with me. It was not certain that they would have allowed him to pass through the gate. Another two-pound ball had come in and had done much more damage than the other one that came in on the first day of October. Also, another large-sized bullet had found its way through a window and lodged in the parlor on the settee. These two balls and two bullets all came from the east, and doubtless from the Imperialist guns, distant half a mile on the Wang Poo river. I called on the Lo family, into which Ne May has married, also saw her mother. All seemed exceedingly glad to see me, not excepting the old gentleman, who has always been so much opposed to foreigners. Heard from Ahna, that she is still alive, though feeble. I brought out of the city as much as Afo, our man, could bring; then went back, and, without any note, brought out nearly all my books except Chinese, and some other articles. A good day's work! Next day I went again, but they gave me a very cold reception at the city gate. I did not see the man on the wall who had always seconded my efforts to gain admittance. They even threatened to kill my coolies, who had come to assist me. A few days after, Dr. Medhurst said they repelled him at the same place with drawn swords.

Dr. Medhurst has recently seen a man who has been a long time in the camp of the revolutionists, but since August has been in the camp of the Imperialists. The following are the principal items of this man's testimony, most of which you have already heard from other sources. The patriots at Nankin worship God every day and before every meal. They do not allow of smoking tobacco or opium, or gambling, or wine-drinking, or licentousness, or quarreling, or stealing, or raillery. The soldiers have no wages. They have all things common, and at table all fare alike. Their wives fought beside their husbands until they reached Nankin; now they are kept separate, have their separate duties, spend much time in learning (to read, I suppose, and the doctrine.) The husbands and wives are all registered, and when they have gained the empire each man is to have his own wife. They allow of no secret societies. They had some such, but put them to death. They allow only their own books. Some of the classics are used, but they are expurgated additions. Every thing belonging to the Budhist and Tauest sects is destroyed. Their temples and images are smashed to pieces. Their priests dare not show their faces. They keep the Sabbath regularly (seventh day probably;) they do no work on that day, except what is necessary. They all assemble in large halls for public worship, kneel down to prayer, and their chiefs exhort them. A chief by the name of Lae exhorted them at Nankin. They know nothing about Baptism or the Lord's Supper. This man left Nankin in order to visit his brother in the Imperialist camp. His brother had his head shaven, and then he dare not go back, (although he preferred the other party,) for fear of losing his head. It is not probable that I shall be able to see this man to inquire more particularly. I think it is a fixed principle with the patriots to compel no man to join their fraternity and with them to worship God. This is to be left to the choice of each individual. This liberty of conscience, when considered in connection with the strictness of their laws, is truly wonderful. What shall be the precise line of duty for us, if we shall gain access to them, will be a matter to be profoundly considered by us. Your earnest prayers for us are solicited.

DEDICATION.

According to previous notice, the new church edifice at Alfred Center was dedicated, on the 16th of February, to the worship of God. The morning opened brightly, and although the going was bad, owing to recent thaws and freezes, yet at the appointed hour the house, which is capable of conveniently seating between seven and eight hundred people, was well filled by an audience ready to listen to the exercises of the occasion. We found the house one combining greater taste, neatness, simplicity, spaciousness, and adaptability, than any other of the kind we ever had the pleasure of entering, in city or country. Great credit is certainly due to those who have had its construction in charge for the skill and energy manifested, and to the whole society for the unanimity and promptness with which it has seconded their efforts.

The Dedicatory Exercises were as follows:

1. Voluntary by the choir.
2. Reading of the 27th Psalm, by Eld. James Marvin.
3. Reading of hymn 911, by Eld. H. P. Burdick—singing.
4. Prayer by Eld. W. B. Maxson.
5. Reading hymn 909, Eld. D. E. Maxson—singing.
6. Dedicatory sermon by Eld. W. B. Maxson.

The following is an abstract of the discourse :—

Having been invited by the brethren and pastor of this Church to be with you on this occasion, I have come. I thank God for this privilege of again meeting my friends, and that their efforts in erecting this house of worship have been so happily consummated. It was my lot, in other years, to meet with this people in school houses—log houses; but God met with us, and blessed us. Happy times did we then have together. You have been prospered, and have progressed by degrees until you have been permitted to erect this habitation for the worship of God.

As an introduction to my remarks on this occasion, I would call your attention to Psalm 84 : 1—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts!"

No Christian needs an argument to satisfy him of the truthfulness of the sentiment of this text. It was doubtless written by David, who was raised from obscurity to posts of honor and emolument; yet in all of the various situations of his eventful life, his heart longed for the tabernacles of Lord. His heart panted, even fainted for the courts of the Lord. One thing above all others he desired and sought after—it was to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of his life. This is the experience of all the children of God. They choose, with Mary, to sit at the feet of Jesus, and learn of him the wisdom of heaven. A similarity of feeling pervades the hearts of all true Christians. A peculiar interest is connected with all of their outlays and sacrifices in the preparation of a place of worship.

The tabernacle was a place of peculiar interest. There the Law of God was deposited—there was the cherubim—the mercy-seat—and holy incense arose there. It was the place where God met with man to bless him. Though there was but one tabernacle, yet the term is accommodative, and applies to all places of worship. May this house be truly the tabernacle of the Lord! May here be found the mercy-seat—may the cherubim hover here! May holy incense constantly go up from this altar!

This is a dedication scene of peculiar interest. It is among a people specially blest of heaven. Among other blessings, you have a Seminary of Learning, well conducted and prosperous. It is very true, that it is not primarily for religious purposes, yet it is developing mind, enlarging views, preparing souls to understand the works of God, and to comprehend truth. Though its immediate object is not to conduct souls to Christ, it is an important aid to your church in that labor. It is in the church of God, in this house, erected on that plan of benevolence which will permit all, without money and without price, to sit under the sound of the gospel, to drink of the waters of salvation—it is here the especial work to lead souls to Christ. There is something lovely, something amiable, in all the arrangements and purposes of the house of God. He smiles upon it—He smiles upon our efforts to build a place where we may worship Him. The builders do not invest their funds with the expectation of returns in kind, but returns in the accession of souls to Christ—increase of our spiritual joy—advancement of the kingdom of God. All earthly acquisitions sink into insignificance, when compared with heavenly riches—with the salvation of a single soul. This is the motive, this the hope, animating your breasts. May it please God to prosper you and bless you beyond all your hopes. May you be enabled to say, in the language of the text, How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!

Is it true, that the great God is willing to record His great name on these walls? Yes, if they have been erected to his glory, you may expect that he will take up his abode here, and everything that makes heaven lovely and desirable, from the presence of the Lord, may be expected in his earthly courts. Jesus says, Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.

There is much that makes the house of the Lord pleasant and interesting. Its pulpit is where the plans of God are made known—the gospel banner unfurled. From the pulpit, God speaks, through his ambassador, to the mourner in strains as sweet as an angel's voice—comforts saints, invites and warns the sinner. It has not only a pulpit, but other places for worship and heavenly communion, where brethren may sit together amid the mercy drops of the gospel, where they may dwell together in unity and holy love, and praise their common Father. Who can look back on any place where God has manifested himself to their weary, worn hearts of sin, and spoke peace and comfort to them, without pleasing recollections? The house of God, above all places, is the place around which such recollections cluster.

The house of God is amiable, because here is the altar where we have consecrated ourselves to Christ. It is the place where sinners have been born into the kingdom of God. It is here that saints breathe forth that divine inspiration given them of the Spirit. This place is lovely, because here love flows from heart to heart unrestrained. Christians learn here to love, and to work together. It is their mutual, common work-shop, where they perform the work enjoined upon them, in prayer, in songs of praise, in shouts of victory, which make it so much like heaven. Here the work of God goes on in the conversion of sinners. The Spirit of God is in his house, operating upon the hearts of men. Revivals take place in His house.

This house is especially interesting for other reasons. God's whole law will be uncompromisingly preached from this pulpit. We shall be greatly disappointed if such should not be the case. If, after we shall slumber in our graves, the news should come, that the Alfred pulpit had thus been pandered to public opinion, and the whole truth was no longer preached here, we would, as it were, rise from our dusty beds and come once more to you, and expostulate with you for the desecration. But we hope better things. We feel assured that all the claims of God's law will ever be acknowledged here. In this house, also, all classes of our fellow men will find a hearty welcome. No caste will ever be recognized. All the claims of the down-trodden, the oppressed, will be acknowledged and urged. We have no sympathy with that piety which places its foot upon the neck of a fellow being, and crushes him into the dust. God has no sympathy with such. It is to be regretted that any part of the church of Christ has become so sophisticated, that its members are seeking more earnestly for a citizenship on earth than for a citizenship in heaven. But here all the claims of God's violated law, all the claims of a violated humanity, will be preached. Purity and temperance, and all of the great reformatory movements for bettering humanity, will find here a ready and hearty sympathy.

Thus amiable are all the uses of the house of God—its influences are all lovely.

Many also are the promises relating to the tabernacle of the Lord. All of the promises of God in him are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us. These promises are all conditional. They depend on us. They must be granted through our efforts—through our performance of duties. The worship of God, like all other duties, must be voluntary. Piety going by steam, by machinery, by a forced service, is not virtue. There is no vice in forced transgression. We are not compelled to work the works of righteousness or the works of death. It is true that we are sometimes told that all of our piety is by compulsion, is governed by absolute necessity. This is not true. We are at liberty to love and worship God or not, just as we please. We may neglect every duty. It is possible to neglect prayer, to give way to worldly-mindedness, to lose sight of all purity, simplicity, and loveliness. If a church falls into such a state, the promises of God can no longer be claimed. They all depend on our fulfillment of the condition imposed upon us. No place is more painful than a church filled with contention, strife, hatred, and worldly-mindedness. God would vacate His own throne in heaven, if such a state of things should exist there—and can we expect that He will dwell in His earthly courts under like circumstances? There was no place more lovely than the house of God at Jerusalem; yet its destruction has been utter. His people neglected their duty, relapsed into sin, and God cast them off. If the loveliness of God's house in Jerusalem was thus utterly destroyed, how easily may we also thus destroy its amiableness and beauty. Piety must be here, as everywhere else, like the Philosopher's Stone, changing everything into gold.

What are some of the conditions for making the tabernacle of the Lord amiable?

1. It must be well filled with willing, cheerful listeners to the preached word. It must be made a happy place, not a place of skulls—a Golgotha. Sinners must be enticed here—children must be brought here. Do not leave them at home to run in the streets. Do not fear that they will not behave well, or that they are too young to be benefited. Children are capable of learning in the house of God, much younger than is generally supposed—and they will behave, if they are well instructed at home. Let then all classes come, and how it will lift up the minister's heart—what strength and energy it will give him in the performance of his duties!

2. To make it lovely, you must live like Christ—be Christians, not only in the house of God, but out of it; while mingling with the world, do not act and talk like worldlings. Do not drive away unbelievers from your place of worship, by the sinfulness of your daily lives.

3. Be at peace among yourselves. Let there be but one heart, and let its pulsations be regular and healthy, and sending currents of pure life blood to all the members of the body. Let there not be a palsied limb, a blind eye, a deaf ear, or a mute tongue; but, let all the members of the body be healthy and active, performing all of their functions harmoniously as a part of one perfect body in Christ. Let there be a full and prompt attendance, not only at the meetings on the Sabbath, but, also, at church, prayer, and covenant meetings. And while punctual in the performance of these duties, let not religious duties be neglected at home. A faithful performance of duty there, will give strength for the performance of those that are more public. In all of these duties there should be cheerfulness. Religion is calculated to make us happy—make happy hearts, happy countenances, happy praying, happy singing. God is a cheerful, a happy Being, and desires that His children should be so.

4. Be progressive. We are apt to cling to the customs of the past and hate change. I recollect that when I first commenced preaching we used to line the hymns one line at a time. Thinking it rather slow business, I undertook to read two at a time, but there was so much opposition to the innovation, that I was obliged to fall back on the old method. So when hymn-books were introduced, there was opposition to the movement. The same has been the case with all similar improvements. There was a time when an instrument introduced into the house of God would have driven out many persons as quick as if a man with the small-pox had entered. Let us have the very best singing possible—let us have harmony and melody, and not jargon. How fine it would be to have instruments to lead the congregation! And why not? Heaven is represented as a place where golden harps are used. If instruments are used in heaven in the worship of God, why not use them in His worship on earth? Let all learn to sing. I remember a singing school where old and young went on purpose to learn to sing praises to God, and while we were singing the Spirit of God came down and filled our hearts, so that we had to leave off singing and go to weeping and praying and chanting. Let all, both believer and unbeliever, sing. David says, I would that everything that hath breath would praise the Lord.

In conclusion, may everything be amiable and lovely, pleasant and prosperous. May you be like a ship well manned, sail all unfurled before a favorable breeze—a rich cargo on board—may you have a prosperous voyage, steering clear of rocks and quicksands, and land many a precious soul in the haven of eternal rest. May this church be indeed a light to guide souls to Christ.

Will you start thus? Or shall the whole scene be overspread with the pall of death? If you will thus commence, and seek for a revival of pure religion in your souls, God will pour out His Spirit upon you.

7. Prayer—Eld. N. V. Hull.
8. Reading hymn 905—Eld. T. E. Babcock—singing.
9. Remarks by Eld. Hull, in which he urged upon the congregation the importance of dedicating their hearts, as well as the house, to the Lord.
10. Singing by the choir.
11. Benediction.

Preaching each day and evening, interspersed with prayer meetings, was continued till First-day evening, with continually increasing interest.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW IN THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.—The Senate's Select Committee have reported a very stringent bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating beverages. The House Committee have signified their approval of the bill; and its passage through both branches of the Legislature is now considered quite probable.

☞ Correspondents will address Wm. M. Jones, care of Geo. B. Utter, No 9 Spruce-st. New York. Letters, papers, parcels, &c., directed thus, will be sent to him in Palestine;

AGRICULTURAL AND CONVERSION EFFORTS IN PALESTINE.

That "the Jews generally regard the agricultural efforts now making in Palestine with favor, under the impression that they have no reference to the conversion of the Jews to Christianity," is not quite so conclusive as to be received without some allowance. We cut the following from The Occident, which paper was alluded to week before last as an evidence of the unsuspecting character of the Jewish press. After speaking favorably of the benevolence of the agricultural effort in Palestine, the editor says:—

"But we must not forget, that they have also a sectarian aim in addition to their benevolent object, and this is to effect a conversion to their creed of those they so kindly help forward, and thus to withdraw them from the fold of Judaism. However wrong we Israelites may deem such purpose, we must acknowledge that it is perfectly consistent with the principles of Christianity. Its followers believe themselves commanded to preach the gospel unto all nations; and it is not to be expected that the Jews should be excluded, when they offer their creed to those who have not yet adopted it. Our assertion, that they had better go and convert the heathen and infidels among themselves, both in high and low life, will be met with the apology, that while they do not neglect the evil in their midst, for which they apply the antidote of domestic missions, they are not permitted to overlook the destitution, as they term it, of heathens, Jews, and Mahomedans. So we must expect that, with the interest of late years excited towards the poor sufferers in Palestine, their religion will become, either openly or covertly, a mark of attack."

Again he says:—

"Shall it become the duty of the rabbis and elders to denounce farming and common schools, from the danger which lurks behind the ostensible benevolence? We must not forget, that should the American missionaries succeed in teaching our people agriculture and the mechanic arts, they will have done more by their presence to abolish poverty and beggary, than all the munificent sums which have been sent thither from time immemorial, and which may be hereafter sent. Hence we should, for our part, be sorely grieved, should the effort to colonize portions of Palestine by American farmers prove unsuccessful, from the fact that their motives are suspicious."

That our friends should be very seriously embarrassed in view of their position before the Jewish people, after such expressions of their sense of Christian duty, we cannot believe. T. B. S.

SAILING OF OUR MISSIONARIES.

The Committee on Outfit are informed that our missionaries have engaged a passage to Smyrna on board the bark Rose Pool, which is to sail from Boston about the first of next week. The Rose Pool is a small vessel, and her accommodations are not of the first order, but our brethren are anxious to be on their errand, and have therefore concluded to sacrifice some of the usual comforts of a sea voyage rather than delay their departure. The present probability is, that they will sail on the 6th or 7th of March, and unless the time should be anticipated by an earlier appointment, our brethren will leave Westerly, Monday morning, for Boston. Any freight not yet sent may therefore be directed to the Bark Rose Pool, Boston, instead of Westerly, as heretofore.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The receipts of the American Tract Society for the last month were $60,056, including $29,525 in donations. The gratuitous circulation of publications since April 1st exceeds 46,000,000 of pages. The daily issues of books is about 5,000, and of other publications, including periodicals, nearly 50,000. At the meeting of the Executive Committee on the 20th Feb. information was communicated from the Rev. Dr. King of Athens, Greece, that the obstacles to his labors were chiefly removed, and that he was about to enlarge his operations with the press. Letters from different parts of India acknowledged previous grants of money, and requested further appropriations. Intelligence from missionaries in China, as to the character of the revolution in progress there, encourages increased activity in preaching and tract distribution. A letter from the Hon. Walter Lowrie, Secretary of the General Assembly's Board of Foreign Missions, acknowledged the receipt of $3,500 for the press in Northern India, Siam and China. On the morning of the day of meeting, an unknown donor sent to the Treasurer nearly $1,000 as a "thank-offering."

A CHURCH WITH MONEY IN ITS TREASURY.—The Worcester Spy states that the Congregational society in North Brookfield, of which the venerable Dr. Snell is now the senior pastor, have within the last three months enlarged and repaired their meeting-house, so that it will accommodate a thousand people, and is now one of the most elegant houses of worship in the State. On the 16th ult., 168 pews in the house were offered for sale at auction, and within some four or five hours, 160 of these pews were sold for $13,547, leaving the society free of debt, with pews at their disposal, and $3,600 in the treasury!

SALARIES OF WESTERN MISSIONARIES.—A correspondent of the Chicago Evangelist, said to be a "faithful and self-denying missionary, who occupies a very important field of labor," speaks of the effect of the vast network of internal improvements now going on in the West, in augmenting the price of labor, of provisions, and of property, by which those ministers who could barely live on their salaries must now run in debt and incur the charge of dishonesty, and adduces his own experience in proof:

"Until the year 1852, I have been able to meet my family expenses with a salary, partly nominal, of $400. But last year the cost of living increased so much, that at the close of the year I found myself unable to meet the expenses of the year, by near $100. This year, with that debt pressing upon me, I have been engaged in a desperate effort to repress our expenses, at least, to our actual income. But now, nearly at the close of the year, I find the problem impossible to solve—if we keep ourselves decently clothed, and have food to eat and wood to burn. And now I am forced to meet the question as to duty for the future: Whether to leave my people, whom I love, but who are poor, and seek some other field where it is less expensive to live; or to engage partly in some other business; or to turn quite aside from the ministry, at least for a time, in order to liquidate old debts, and provide something for the time to come."

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 20.

In the SENATE, after the usual opening business, Mr. Johnson reported a bill for the organization into separate territories of the Choctaw, Cherokee and Creek tribes of Indians. After the transaction of some routine business, the Nebraska bill was taken up, Mr. Petit of Indiana having the floor, who spoke in favor of the bill.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the bill from the Senate to extend the pre-emption privilege throughout the State of California was passed. The 7th, 8th and 9th of March were set apart for the consideration of local business which pertains to the organized Territories. The bill extending the provisions of the several laws granting bounty lands to the officers, soldiers and sailors who served in the war of 1812 and the Indian wars since 1790, was reported, with a recommendation that it do not pass. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, when Mr. Noble of Michigan got the floor and spoke in opposition to the levying of tunnage duties. The speaking then turned on the Missouri Compromise, Mr. Ewing of Kentucky contending that the line of 36° 30′ never was a compromise line, and was unconstitutional.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 21.

In the SENATE, Mr. Bayard of Del. presented several petitions in favor of establishing all territorial governments on the principle of non-intervention by Congress. Mr. Gwin introduced a bill authorizing the construction by the United States Government, of six additional steam frigates for the navy. The consideration of the Nebraska bill was then resumed. Mr. Sumner of Mass. having the floor, made an able and eloquent speech in opposition to the bill. The Senate then adjourned over until Fifth-day, on account of the anniversary of Washington's birth-day.

In the HOUSE, after the transaction of some unimportant business, the Homestead bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Bent of Ga. spoke in opposition to the bill, and Mr. Gerrit Smith of N. Y. strongly favored it, considering it second in importance to no other bill. Mr. J. Allen of Ill. spoke in opposition to the Missouri Compromise. The bill extending the provisions of the several bounty land laws was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. The House then adjourned over until Fifth-day.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 23.

In the SENATE, Messrs. Seward and Chase presented a large number of petitions against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Mr. Shields presented the petition of the inventor of the atmospheric telegraph, asking an appropriation of $5,000 to construct his telegraph for ten miles. The inventor asserts that he can transmit packages weighing 500 pounds 500 miles an hour. Mr. Cass presented a petition asking the interposition of the Government of the United States with foreign powers, in order to secure to American citizens abroad the enjoyment of religious worship while living, and a place of sepulchre and the rights of Christian burial when dead. The Nebraska bill was then taken up. Mr. Toombs of Georgia made a speech in favor of the bill. When Mr. Toombs concluded, Mr. Hunter of Virginia got the floor, and the subject was postponed. The bill appropriating $3,000,000 for the construction of six steam frigates, was then taken up and passed, and after a short Executive Session, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Wheeler presented the proceedings of the mechanics of New York against a repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The Commitee on Public Lands reported back the Senate bill granting two and a half millions of acres of land to Wisconsin for railroads in that State.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 24.

In the SENATE, when the consideration of the Nebraska bill was resumed, Mr. Douglas announced that a caucus of the friends of the bill had been held, and had agreed that the debate on the subject should be closed by Fourth-day. Mr. Hunter of Virginia, and Mr. Butler of South Carolina, then spoke in favor of the bill. The Committee appointed to investigate the charges against Gov. Ramsley of Minnesota were discharged, and his accounts ordered to be settled by the Accounting Officers of the Government. A large number of petitions from different States against a repeal of the Missouri Compromise ware presented.

The HOUSE was principally engaged in the discussion of a bill confirmatory of certain school sections, some States being now deprived of the 16th section, to which they are entitled. It is said that there are now some twenty cases pending, and the object of the bill is to provide a remedy for the evil. Mr. Gallegos was admitted to his seat as Delegate from New Mexico. Resolutions from the Legislatures of Virginia and New Jersey, in favor of granting full bounty lands to the soldiers of 1812, were presented. The House adjourned over until Second-day.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 25.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions against the passage of the Nebraska bill were presented. Mr. Cass presented his petition on Religious Freedom abroad, and made a speech on the foreign policy of America. This speech was occasioned by the declaration in the speech recently made by the British Secretary of Foreign Affairs, that the Anglo-French alliance extends to Western as well as Eastern affairs, which, Mr. C. said, clearly means an alliance designed to check our national aggrandizement by the acquisition of Cuba. The consideration of the Nebraska bill was then resumed, and Mr. Butler of South Carolina concluded his speech in favor of the bill. Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, and Mr. Brown, of Mississippi, also spoke in favor of the bill.

California News.

The steamer Northern Light, with two weeks later news from California, arrived at New York, Feb. 23d. She brought 400 passengers and $800,000 in specie on freight.

A good deal of excitement had been produced in San Francisco by the alledged attempt of Mr. Palmer (of the house of Palmer, Cook & Co.) to bribe one of the State Senators in regard to the Senatorial election.

The latest intelligence from the Fillibusters in Lower California reaches to the 17th ult. At that date they were in a state of masterly inactivity at their camp in Ensenada, waiting for something to turn up. The band had been thinned by the desertion of several of its members, who had arrived at San Diego, with the report that the Fillibusters were short of provisions, and had begun to obtain supplies by helping themselves to the provisions of the rancheros. A decree of President Walker had annexed Sonora to the new Republic.

In the north, difficulties have again commenced. The Indians complain that some of their tribes have been shot down without provocation, and that the treaties are not observed. The whites complain that the Indians are constantly stealing stock. Three or four conflicts have occurred. Five Indians were killed at Burnt Ranch, on Trinity River, seven were killed in a fight on Smith River, and the Klamath Indians surrounded and attacked a party of whites who had gone out to recover stolen stock on the 13th January. The whites were defeated with a loss of 4 men. It is supposed that there will be a serious war.

The Golden Gate, ocean steamer, went ashore on a reef just outside of the harbor of San Diego on the 18th. She remained there till the 25th, when, after being lightened, she was got off by kedging, with the aid of the steamer Columbia.

The silver mine announced to have been discovered ninety miles east of Monterey, in the mountains, is said to be very promising. Some of the ore which has been tried produced $40 from 100 lbs. of ore.

The stringency in the monetary affairs consequent on the long drouth, the small produce of the mines, and the overburdened condition of the San Francisco market, has occasioned several heavy failures.

Newspaper dates from China have been received at San Francisco to Dec. 13. The Register says the interest in the rebellion is concentrated on the army advancing toward Pekin, and of this nothing is known with certainty, except that it is somewhere in Chili, the province in which Pekin is situated. All else, at present, is mere conjecture or fable.

European News.

Three days later news from Europe, being to Feb. 11th, was received in New York last Sabbath.

A better feeling prevailed in the Liverpool Cotton Market; Breadstuffs were becoming cheaper; Money comparatively easy, and Funds steady, notwithstanding the warlike aspect of affairs.

From the seat of war, we have a brief announcement, that on Feb. 5, an encounter took place between the Turks and Russians near Giurgevo. Three thousand Turks crossed the river. They drove in the Russian outposts and attacked the town. At nightfall they recrossed to their camp. Further than the above, there is scarcely any news from the seat of war.

There are as yet no tidings of any answer from St. Petersburg to the last ultimatum of France and England. Nicholas was said to be sick—with erysipelas, some say—but at all events he had not seen any one for ten days.

On the 24th January, a memorial was presented to Lord Stratford, by twenty-three masters of British merchant ships, asking if it was safe for them to proceed to the ports of their destination in the Black Sea. Lord Stratford replied that it is impossible to foretell what each day may bring forth.

Ismael Pasha, the active Governor of Smyrna, has succeeded in capturing the notorious Greek pirate Condora, who has long been the terror of merchantmen on that coast.

Preparations for war go on actively in England. Government order has been issued calling on all Greenwich (naval) pensioners, under 60 years of age, "no matter how employed or engaged," to attend at the Pension Office for inspection by Admiralty officers to ascertrin their fitness for service. The men are threatened with loss of pension if they fail to attend. Recruiting is active for all arms of the service.

Another distressing shipwreck had taken place on the Island of Barra, western coast of Scotland. On the night of the 27th ult., the ship W. H. Davis, from Liverpool for New Orleans, went ashore on the rocks near Vatersay, within a short distance from the spot where the emigrant ship Ann Jane was lost a few months ago. The W. H. Davis became unmanageable during a heavy gale, and in attempting to weather Barra Head was driven on the rocks with such violence that in a few minutes she went to pieces, and all hands, except one man, the steward, were drowned, 30 in all. Several of the bodies were washed up and were interred at Vatersay.

SLAVERY PROJECTS.—The Boston Commonwealth says that the slave interest has three schemes which it is now pursuing with great pertinacity. (1.) The slaveholders intend that the Supreme Court shall decide that they may take their slaves into the free States and hold them there as safely as in the slave States. They are using the Lemmon case to secure such a decision. (2.) They intend to open all our free territitory to the introduction of slavery. Douglas's Nebraska bill shows what they are doing in this direction. (3.) They intend to aid and comfort the African slave-trade, by securing payment for the Amistad negroes. Some of them are beginning to say this trade should be restored, and to declare that it was abolished by the influence of "morbid sentimentalism."

ROMAN CATHOLIC ARROGANCE.—The Providence (R. I.) Tribune says that the wife of Mr. Jenkinson, living in the south part of that city, died on the 5th inst., leaving two children, one about seven years and the other about seven months old. Mr. J. is a Protestant, and his wife was a Catholic. After his wife's death, Mr. J. broke up house-keeping and paid the board of his children at the house of a Mr. Murphy, a Catholic. Having obtained another boarding-place for his children, Mr. J. went to remove them, when he was told that he could not have them without the consent of the Bishop—that he had instructed him not to give them up. Mr. J. thought it a hard case that he could not have his own children, and went to get legal advice. In the mean time he saw Mr. C. Matthewson, who told him he would go with him and see if they could not get the children. They went together, but Mr. Murphy and wife still refused to let the children go, giving the same reason as before. They were about to take them away, when Mr. Murphy struck at Mr. Matthewson with a poker, whereupon they left the house and had Mr. Murphy arrested for an assault. He was up before the Court of Magistrates and fined $3 and cost, from which decision he appealed. The children are now not to be found, and the father is told that the Bishop is to decide how and where his children shall be educated.

A SAD AND MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.—On the 10th of January last, a man by the name of Nicholas Phillpot was married at the Episcopal Church in the village of Batavia, and in the evening himself and bride, together with about a dozen others, held a wedding party at Mrs. Peard's, in East Pembroke. Shortly after the party, all that attended were taken violently ill. The bridegroom and bride, and a young man by the name of Peard, all died the early part of last week, and the others are still very sick. The cause is not known, but it is believed to be from the effects of poison contained in some liquor used on the occasion, either by design or accident. Two more of the party are so dangerously ill that their recovery is extremely doubtful.

SUMMARY.

Miss Delia Webster, who was pardoned out of the Kentucky Penitentiary, where she was confined on a charge of abducting slaves, has received notice from the citizens of Thimble County, that she must leave the State immediately. This is in consequence of the recent disappearance of a number of slaves, and the arrest of the Rev. Norris Day at Madison, Ind., on the charge of abducting slaves. Day, it is alleged, is a partner of Miss Webster in the business, and the two, it is said, resided on a farm which they had purchased in Trimble County.

The health of Mrs. Judson (Fanny Forrester) is still declining. The Madison County Journal says: "The progress of her decline, though less rapid than it was during the month of January, has not been stayed, and we have no assurance that it will be. She is attended by one of the most eminent physicians in Central New York, and every thing that skill can accomplish will be done to restore her to health."

The Troy Whig states that the whole line of railroad from the termination of the Harlem Railroad at Chatham to Bennington in Vermont, has, under acts of the Legislature of New York, Massachusetts and Vermont, and the action of the stockholders, been consolidated into one under the name of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company. About 20 miles of this road are being graded, and the remaining 34 are being located.

Com. Perry of the Japan Expedition has had the cabin of the Susquehannah splendidly fitted with silk, damask and gold, it was said, for the reception of the Japan dignitaries. Having landed to present the President's letter, it is asserted to be his intention to insist upon the Emperor's reply being brought on board to him. His landing near Jeddo, and the reception of the letter on shore with becoming ceremony is considered a great breakdown on former customs.

While at the Bonin Islands the U. S. ship Plymouth had the misfortune to lose one of her lieutenants and thirteen men, with one of her boats, in a typhoon. The party in the boat left the ship in the morning, on a turtling and hunting excursion, and while absent a severe gale sprang up, in which it was supposed they were lost, as they were not seen or heard of afterward.

Emigrant Ticket Swindlers are plenty in New York, and several of them have recently been arrested for selling Tickets to emigrants which purported to be good for the far West, but were good only perhaps half the way. Never buy tickets of runners, but rather go to the regular offices of the railroads and steamboats.

The grand total of hogs packed the present winter at Cincinnati is given at 426,479. This exceeds any previous year, except 1848, when the number was 475,000. Last year it was 361,000. Kentucky has furnished this season to the Cincinnati and Covington slaughter-houses 106,855, and most of them hogs of large sizes.

The alleged frauds committed upon the pension office by Gen. Ford, Judge Vondersmith, and Alderman Evans of Lancaster, Pa, have extended over a space of fifteen years, and the amount drawn during that period from the United States Treasury, will reach the sum of fifty thousand dollars.

A dispatch dated Washington, Thursday, Feb. 23, 1854, says: Gen. Armstrong, of the Union, died of congestion of the brain this evening at 7 o'clock, aged 64 years. He leaves four daughters and three sons. Gen. Jackson bequeathed his war sword to this gallant soldier.

Officer Spicer, of the Court of Sessons, arrested, on Saturday, Feb. 25th, Wm. Hays and his wife Clara, on a bench warrant issued by the Court of Sessions, charging them with the murder of Dr. Lutener. The Grand Jury, it appears, found indictments against these parties.

John Silverthorne, a drover, in attempting to leave a train of cars, on the Columbia Railroad, near Lancaster, when in motion, fell between the cars, and the whole train passed over him, cutting his body into three pieces. Ten cars were thrown off the track, and several cattle killed.

A company of five negroes, the property of James Merton, of Gallatin Co., Ky., succeeded in making their escape, on the night of Feb. 14th. They had only to cross the Ohio river, when they were taken in charge by some friends who soon had them on their way to Canada by the "underground."

Mr. Ruskin has said, in the preface to his pamphlet on Pre-Raphaelitism, that "no great intellectual thing was ever done by great effort; a great thing can only be done by a great man, and he does it without effort."

The steamer Africa, which was stuck in the mud three miles from New York, got off last week, and sailed for Liverpool.

The ship Cornelius Grinnell arrived at New York on the 24th Feb., bringing the officers and crew of the ship Columbiana, abandoned at sea, and of the brig Frederick, likewise abandoned.

DIED,

In the village of Scotia, near Schenectady, on the evening of the 16th February, 1854, Rev. JOHN D. GREENE, aged about 35. He had that evening written a very interesting letter to his niece in Clarkville, (his former place of residence,) in regard to the long-protracted and very painful sickness of her mother, (his sister,) since deceased. In that letter he stated that he hoped, that when his Heavenly Father should see fit to call him hence, the change would be instantaneous. His health had been very good, and he had been settled but a short time, as pastor of the Baptist Church in and about that little village, with flattering prospects of future usefulness. After finishing the letter above mentioned, he complained to his wife of a pain in his head, and laid down on his bed, and in fifteen minutes died in a fit. The officiating clergyman at his funeral, instead of a new sermon, read the letter above mentioned, and the sermon that the deceased preached on the last New Year's day, from this text: "This year thou shalt die."

In Clarkville on the 21st Feb., Mrs. AMY CLARKE, aged 46, wife of Maxson Clarke, Jr., and sister of the late Rev. John D. Greene. H. B. C.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

What is Rum?

I asked an [illegible], a man of cares,
Wrinkled, [illegible], and white with hoary hairs.
Rum is the [illegible] of the soul, he said,
Ye young [illegible], take warning from the dead.]

I asked a [illegible], ere the stroke
Of ruthless [illegible] life's golden bowl had broke;
I asked him, What is rum? Rum, he replied,
The curse of earth—my ruin—and he died.

I asked a weeping wife; she raised her eye,
All filled [illegible], and this was her reply:
Rum dash[illegible] the fond hopes of earthly bliss,
And made [illegible] a cup of bitterness.

The Eloquence of Hon. Gerrit Smith.

The source of the power of an orator over his audience [illegible] thing that has never been described. The presence of the orator can alone reveal [illegible]. His language may be written down and printed, word for word as he delivers it, and yet fail to impress the reader with more than ordinary emotions; but we can only attempt to describe the looks, the gestures, the tones, and the modulations of the speaker.

When Gerrit Smith arose to address the House in an impromptu manner, a few days ago, after Messrs. Smith of Alabama, and Smith of Virginia, had occupied the attention of that body, a member remarked very audibly, that "the Smith family appeared to have possession of the Hall!" In a few moments, however, that gentleman, as did almost every individual present, leaned forward, profoundly attentive, to catch every word that should fall from the lips of the speaker. Along the aisles there were many who paused and stood still to listen. We looked around to observe the aspect of the House, and could nowhere detect an instance of inattention. Whence was the charm? Our readers have perused the words of the speaker. They were beautifully simple and appropriate; but the occasion did not permit the utterance of vehement or impassioned language. The remarkable effect produced would not have been witnessed, if any other orator had uttered these words. It has been said that it proceeded from the peculiar voice of Mr. Smith, which is described by a writer as "equal to that of Henry Clay." We were familiar with the tones of Mr. Clay's voice, and have often been enraptured with its effect; but, in our opinion, it was by no means so uniformly good as that of Mr. Smith. We have never heard a voice so pleasing, so impressive, and so unaffected. The elder Vandenhoff, in the zenith of his powers—noble and stately tragedian that he was—possessed a voice the musical richness and depth of which recur to us as we listen to Mr. Smith; but it was artistic; the practiced elocutionist could not fail to detect the agency of art in the formation of that voice. Mr. Smith, on the contrary, speaks without effort. The muscles of his throat are not strained, and no words are "mouthed," as Hamlet expresses it.

In the days of his childhood, the writer frequented on the Sabbath a large old church in which there was a majestic organ, and many a time was he the involuntary but delighted captive of the influence of that instrument, the tones of which were so deep and perfect, as their tremor rolled along the vaulted dome and woke an echo in each arch and angle in the edifice. The voice of Mr. Smith now produces a similar influence upon him.

But it is not only the voice. Not more distinct and impressive are its tones than is the inspiration produced by the appearance of the speaker. Fifty odd years probably have passed over, without bending his tall, energetic form. His features are strongly marked with the impress of an active mind and an independent and elevated character. Upon them, especially when speaking, rests the pleasing and subduing influence of a benevolence, the genuineness of which no beholder can for a moment doubt. This, if we may be permitted to judge, is the most effective point in his eloquence. His intellectual power, and the tones that thrill us, may indeed be resisted; but the attributes of the heart that are mirrored upon the features of the face demand our respect and our sympathy.

In proof of this truth, the noble and manly reponse of the Hon. Mr. Preston, of Kentucky, may be instanced; as also the effects of the brief speech to which we have already alluded, when, having given utterance to sentiments so diametrically opposed to those entertained by a vast majority of the people of the South and their representatives, Mr. Smith was approached by a member from Alabama, and by other gentlemen, who pressed towards him, and ardently clasped his hands in acknowledgement of the impression his eloquence had made upon them. The Cost of Living in New York.

The rise in price of food, and on nearly all other articles of prime necessity, with the consequent and in many instances most extravagant increase of rents, is a subject that comes home to every one, and most forcibly so to the laboring classes. As nearly as we can calculate from the comparison of wholesale prices at the 1st of May for the past six years, and at the present time for this year, we conclude that the average increase of family expenses for food and fuel has been thirty per cent. since May last. True, there are many articles as cheap now as then; but all breadstuffs are up fifty per cent., while vegetables show a rise in nearly the same proportion. Of rents, we have not figures to speak with exactness. They have been going up, up, up, for four years, with perfectly appalling strides; and this spring the advance is in a fair way to o'ertop the wildest imagination. But few houses are advertised yet, and landlords are very generally watching the effect of the thumb-screws upon the tenants they now have. No family comfortably situated desires to move. It is a most vexatious and expensive business, and this fact arms the landlord with a weapon which too many wield without mercy. Mrs. Smith wants a new carriage, but Mr. S. objects—he has no money to spare; whereupon the amiable Mrs. S. recommends that $50 each be added to the rent of those houses in —— street, "because," says she, "they can't afford to move for that, and so they will be obliged to stand it, and then the carriage will cost you nothing." Another landlord grumbles at the extravagant City Government, and accordingly adds a hundred dollars on this store, and two hundred on that; another, and as likely as not a man without a family, pleads the rise in provisions as a reason for adding two or three thousand to his rent roll, as if his appetite for food was as insatiable as his love of money. The tenant who rebels finds, generally, that the scale of exactions has been so nicely graduated, that his losses and expenses in moving amount to a little more than it would have cost him to stay. This process is repeated every spring, and rents are gradually and surely enhanced by tens and twenties and fifties, until the tenant of ten years finds himself paying from 50 to 100 per cent. more than when he first took possession. The only hope of relief is the advent of some commercial revulsion or other great change in the money market, which is pretty sure to ruin the tenant while it reduces his rent, leaving him with an empty pocket at the foot of the ladder, with no alternative but to climb the same weary rounds again. There are whole blocks of stores in the upper part of the city, of which the rent has been nearly doubled within four years, while the valuation on the tax-book has not increased one cent. Some stores and dwellings rent at the rate of thirty per cent. per year on their taxed valuation. One store and dwelling in the Sixth-avenue, about twenty feet front and two and a half stories high, is subject this year to an increase of six hundred dollars on the rent (450) of last year. The man in possession must pay this enormous figure, or break up a snug business which he has built up by years of patient perseverance. We know of a dwelling which last year brought $1,500, but which now must pay $2,500; and of another which is raised from $850 to $1,100. How any considerable number of people can live at such rates, we cannot conceive. In fact, it would seem that no family can now think of living in New York, in any degree of elegance, on less than five or six thousand dollars a year.

This enormous rise in rents, which makes New York about the dearest city in the world, we believe will not so seriously affect the tenements of the laboring classes. We have made considerable inquiry in this direction, the result of which is that the average rise upon tenements containing from two to five families will amount to perhaps $20 to $40 per family, which, compared with the additions upon dwellings of higher pretension and upon stores, is quite moderate. Still this is a hard tax. The dwellings of the laboring classes have always been rented at exorbitant rates, consuming every penny their occupants could possibly give for house room. Besides, the laboring population have long since found a remedy in removing to the many suburbs growing up in the vicinity of the metropolis. People who are not aware of the fact, would be astonished by the swarm of villages that have sprung up within five years, and are now advancing more rapidly than ever. These villages are now to be increased by a new emigration from the great hive. People who have incomes of one, two or three thousand dollars must go to the country; they cannot live in New York. And unless a remedy is found by building large houses in plats, so that a genteel family of moderate means can get a complete abode, at a tolerable rate of rent, this entire class must soon have ceased to reside in the city. Fish Culture.

At a meeting of the Farmer's Club in the American Institute, New York, on the 21st of February, the principal subject under discussion was the supposed new art of breeding fish artificially, by squeezing the spawn from the female fish and fecundating it in water by using the same process with the male fish.

Mr. Secretary Meigs read a very interesting paper upon the artificial breeding of fish in France. He also stated that Dr. Ackley, of Ohio, is devoting his entire attention to this subject. It is ascertained that a national interchange of fish may be easily had by this process, so that waters destitute of any favorite kind of fish may have them introduced from far distant waters. The discovery of transmitting fish-eggs is not a new one. This was shown by a letter from De witt Clinton, which speaks of the practice of artificial breeding of fish by Jawby, more than a hundred years ago.

Dr. Underhill spoke of the advantages to the human family that would arise if all the natural waters were well stocked with fish; and how many places in this country might be rendered beautiful by converting them into artificial fish ponds. Dr. Underhill stated that if plum-trees were planted upon the borders of all these ponds, so as to overhang the water, the fruit will be exempt from the curculio.

Dr. Stevens thought spawn might be taken from shad at the South, where they are plenty, and carried to the Connecticut River, and thus produce a return of those valuable fish to that stream, which has been nearly deserted, in consequence of the difficulty the fish experience in escaping the nets of their captors long enough to deposit their eggs.

Dr. Lambert of Peekskill, thought fish the most appropriate and healthy food for intellectual persons. He said that food fed to fish will return nine pounds out of ten of the amount fed of fish meat for human consumption. He said that it was very common in Vermont to feed trout with mutton, and that it produces a good profit to the feeders, who take the trout to market when sufficiently grown. The breeding of fish, he said, was an old affair in China.

Robert L. Pell of this City, whose place is in Ulster County, opposite Hyde Park, practiced fish breeding and improving for several years. He said 3,000,000 eggs had been counted in a single codfish. The Tench, he says, is the doctor fish of the family. He has succeeded in acclimating, or fresh watering, several ocean kinds, such as Shad, Bass, Sturgeon, &c. Last summer he tried an experiment with ova. He stripped fish caught in the Hudson, both male and female, into a tub of water, and carried it and placed it in gravel in his ponds where the young fish hatched. The Salmon is a salt water fish, but the young must be hatched in fresh water, where they remain until two years old. Mr. Pell said he had eight artificial fish ponds well stocked, where he has cultivated fish for the last ten years. They are so trained that they will come at the ringing of a bell and eat food out of his hand. They are very fond of bread and Indian meal dough as well as any kind of meat. Even the wild Pickerel becomes tame under training. Mr. Pell is of the opinion that many of the bays and ponds along the Hudson might be stocked with Tench and other European sorts of fish, and that we could breed them there to great advantage to the owners of the water.

Mr. Pell thought the Legislature should pass an act for the preservation of Shad in the Hudson, by requiring fishermen to plant spawn every year. Places for planting eggs must be located by law and properly protected, to be of advantage to the public. This is the only way of preventing the total annihilation of Shad in the river. Some eighteen years ago it was common to draw 1,600 or 1,800 shad at a haul. Now, sometimes the fisherman gets only one or two fish in his seine.

The object of Mr. Pell in transplanting shad from the partially salt waters of the Hudson, to the fresh water of his ponds, was not to grow shad for the table, but for food for pickerel. A shad will produce 45,000 eggs, the young of which will afford an abundance of food for the pickerel. As a general thing, fish do not require feeding, as they find sufficient food in the animalcula of the ponds, though they are very voracious feeders when proper food is offered them. In some of his ponds the fish have never been fed, but he can see no difference in the quality of the fish.

In China, fish are fed upon rice. The ages of fish, Mr. Pell thinks, are indicated by rings on the scales of scale fish, and on the vertebra of others.

Parisian Sketch.

A friend living in the Faubourg du Temple, went out at a late hour of a winter evening to take a pistol without lock to the gunsmith's.

Turning the corner of the canal, he was stopped by a man of ferocious aspect, who demanded his life or his purse. It is related that Ordry escaped, when placed in a similar predicament, by a pun; our friend adopted the readier plan of taking his pistol from his pocket and placing it on the highwayman's breast.

"Follow me to the next guard-house, or I 'll pull the trigger!" he exclaimed.

As it was dark, and the robber did not perceive that he was threatened by an imaginary lock, he had recourse to the supplications usual in such cases.

"Sir, do not ruin me?"

"It is to save you, on the contrary, that I lead you to the guard-house."

"I am the father of three children."

"I have six."

"I have a wife who depends upon me for support."

"And so have I."

"Indeed, I am not in reality a wicked man."

"Neither am I. Come, it is late, and rather cold by the water side. March, or I shall fire."

The robber was obliged to follow our friend to the guard-house. They arrived just as a patrol came in. Our friend related his history. The robber was examined, and discovered to be an escaped convict, of whom the police had been for a long time in search.

Our friend was duly congratulated upon his presence of mind, and the energy which had been displayed.

"But," added the officer in command, "I regret to say, I shall be under the necessity of bringing an action against you."

"Why so?"

"Because it appears from your own avowal, that you carry arms upon your person, without the authority to do so."

Our friend then exhibited his pistol, and showed to the officer, that without a cock it was no arm at all.

"Not so," said the officer; "a pistol is always a pistol. I must put your name on the charge sheet."

The robber, turning to our friend, said to him:

"Sir, you have deceived me. May what happens to you now teach you that bad faith and lies always receive, sooner or later, their punishment."

A Singular Case.

A year ago, while the snow was yet upon the ground, a man, woman, and child, were begging food from door to door in Washington city. They were miserable in appearance. One morning the woman made a call at a door for relief, but before food could be brought to her, she fell and expired! It had been observed by some few persons, that she as well as her husband was intelligent, though miserable and bloated. Upon her person was found no clothing but the one outside garment. The man was questioned, and it was ascertained that he had been, in England, an Episcopal minister. They were between thirty and forty years of age. She was buried, and he was conveyed to the Alms-House, where he died in a few days. Their poor little daughter, five years old, had shared their misery. She was found, and placed in the Washington Orphan Asylum, where she now is, a pretty and most interesting child. Upon such information as was obtained from the father and the child, letters were addressed to his relatives in England. But an interested relative there, it is thought, induced the belief that the man had not been married to the woman with whom he had come to this country, and no reply was retured. But the evidence of the marriage of the wretched pair has recently been found by the sister of the deceased man, who is the wife of a Colonel in the British army, and she has just sent an eager message for the child, whom it is her purpose to adopt. The poor father and mother had evidently been fine-looking people. Their name was West. [National Era.

Instances of Longevity.

A new work, in press by Ticknor, Reed & Fields, mentions several instances of extraordinary longevity. They occur mostly in humble life. The most remarkable case is that of Henry Jenkins, a Yorkshire man, who died in 1670, at the age of 169. He could remember the battle of Flodden field, which took place in 1513, when we was but twelve years old. The celebrated Thomas Parr, who died in 1635, at the age of 152, had lived under nine kings of England. He married a second wife when above 120 years of age, and for ten years after was accustomed to do his usual work, and even to thresh. Parr's great-grandson died at Cork a few years since, at the age of 103. A Dane, named Draakenburg, after a life of vicissitudes, fifteen years of which were passed as a slave in Turkey, died in the year 1772, in the 146th year of his age. Fifteen years before his death he fell in love with a young country girl, who very properly rejected his proposal; meeting with like want of success in other quarters, he made up his mind to continue single. The last case mentioned is that of Effingham, who died in Cornwall, in the 144th year of his age. He had served long as a laborer and corporal, and was present at the battle of Hockstedt. After retiring from the service, he returned to his native place, and worked as a day laborer till the day of his death.

According to the Indianapolis Journal, the following numbers and descriptions of newspapers are published in the State of Indiana, viz. Dailies, 13; tri-weeklies, 2; semi-weeklies, 1; weeklies, 121; semi-monthly, 1; monthlies, 6. Total. 144.

Singular Heroism under the Promptings of Humanity.—The following heart-stirring narrative is communicated from Rio Janeiro:—The Pernambucan, one of the vessels of the Brazilian Steam Packet Company, was wrecked near St. Katherine's, on the 11th of October, and upwards of forty of her passengers were drowned. This disaster afforded an opportunity for a display of heroism and bravery rarely equaled. A black sailor, belonging to the vessel, succeeded, with many others, in reaching the shore; numbers had perished in the attempt, and but few of the passengers remained upon the wreck. All of these, including a mother and six children, did Simao save. Twelve times had this noble fellow swam through the furious breakers on the coast, and each time returned, bringing a victim from destruction; then wearied, as he well might be, from his almost superhuman efforts, he threw himself exhausted upon the sands, when a cry was raised that one human being still remained upon the wreck. No one was hardy enough to attempt the rescue of the poor passenger, a blind man, whose piteous cries for succor were faintly heard on shore. But Simao, the brave Simao, again dived into the furious surf, reached the vessel, and brought the poor blind man safely to land, thus saving, by his noble and unaided exertions, no less than thirteen lives.

Hedge Plants.—The osage orange, which has been recommended by a number of writers as a plant well fitted for hedges, is a native of the southwestern States. It grows in great abundance in a wild state in Arkansas, where it takes more the form of a tree than a shrub, growing to the height of thirty or forty feet, with a wide-spreading head; for which reason it is evidently unfitted for a hedge, except by constant severe trimming. It has been found hardy enough to stand the winters as far north as where the Isabella grape is found to ripen its fruit. It grows rapidly, the frost only affecting the young shoots, which have to be trimmed off in the spring. Plants are easily grown from seeds, and are very hardy. A quart of seed will produce a thousand plants. Put them in the ground in October, and transplant a year from the next spring. The principal objections to the osage orange are, that it grows too vigorously, especially in rich ground, and that after the first five or six years it will take too much labor to keep it trimmed and within bounds. It is also a most greedy absorber of all the nutriment in the soil within reach of its long roots. It is the opinion of many farmers, that hedges are not economical in this country. [N. Y. Tribune.

An Allegory.—A miser being dead and fairly interred, came to the banks of the river Styx, desiring to be ferried over along with the other ghosts. Charon demanded his fare, and was surprised to see the miser, rather than pay it, throw himself into the river and swim over to the other side, notwithstanding all the clamor and opposition that could be made to him.

All Tartarus was in uproar; and each of the judges was meditating some punishment suitable to a crime of such dangerous consequences to the infernal revenues.

"Shall he be chained to the rock along with Prometheus? or tremble below the precipice in company with the Danaides? or assist Sisyphus in rolling his stone?"

"No," said Minos. "None of these; we must invent some severer punishment. Let him be sent back to earth, to see the use his heirs are making of his riches."

Newspaper Postage in Canada.—A reduction in the rate of newspaper postage went into effect in Canada on the 1st Feb. By the new arrangement all newspapers and periodicals that are exclusively devoted to education, temperance, science, agriculture, and instruction, are to pass through the mails entirely free from postal charges. The postal charges on Canadian newspapers is established at the following rates per year: Daily, $1 60; tri-weekly, 80 cents; semi-weekly, 23 cents; weekly, 26½ cents. In all cases these rates are to be paid quarterly in advance. The same rates are to apply to papers published in the United States and addressed to subscribers in Canada. Transient papers sent from the office of publication are charged a half-penny, which is a fraction less than our own rates. Magazines and other periodicals published monthly, not weighing more than one ounce, to be charged 6⅔ cents per annum; over one and not exceeding two ounces, 20 cents; and when over three ounces, 40 cents.

A Mysterious Land.—According to the Rochester Democrat, the California steamer brought accounts of the discovery of the ruins of certain cities embosomed in the Rocky Mountains, in the vicinity of the Mormon settlements of Utah. These cities were passed through by Capt. Walker in 1850, who, with the exception of Lieut. Beal, is the only person who has accomplished so great an exploit. Capt. Walker has revealed many interesting particulars in regard to the locality, which cannot fail to elicit great attention and awaken profound interest. He found there the ruins in a state of great perfection; the streets were well defined, and many of the buildings in a remarkable state of preservation; the stone and brick having the appearance of being glazed, as though they had been passed over by a raging conflagration. Captain W. also asserts that he has discovered in that section a race of Albinos, who are probably the descendants of those who erected the buildings.

The Printing Office School.—Mr. Winthrop, in his recent lecture before the Mechanics' Association, made this remark in regard to a printing office as a good school:—

"There is an atmosphere in a printing office, which, somehow or other, puts notions into a boy's head, too, an atmosphere which is very apt to make quick blood run quicker, and impulsive hearts beat higher, and active brains work harder, until those who were only indented to set up types for other people's thoughts, are suddenly found insisting on having other people to set up types for their own thoughts."

Juvenile America.—In President Allen's lecture before the Mercantile Library Association, he alluded to Young America in the following style:—

"Our children show extraordinary precocity. The Miss drops the bib in the evening, and dons the bodice in the morning; and the belle makes but a single jump from the cradle to the cotillon, from pap to the polka. The boy—but we have no boys now—young gentlemen is the word—feels insulted if he is met in the street and not called 'Mister.' He goes from the baby cap to the beaver, and in a twinkling from pea-nuts to politics. He finishes his education at 14, goes into business at 18, marries at 20, and is bankrupt at 21."

Poor Economy.—Among the many acts of poor economy of farmers, that of letting cattle out of their yard in winter to ramble off to the spring or brook, or some pond, where a hole about as big as a cow's head is cut in the ice, and where the poor creatures have to kneel down to reach the water, is about the poorest that we can think of at present. There is not a farm in America, upon which ten head of cattle are kept, but what would make money by expending enough to provide water in the yard, both for winter and summer use. Pumps can be easily made so as to raise water whenever the cattle come to the trough for a drink. Where wells cannot be had, cisterns can be built at little expense.

Benefits of Geological Surveys.—Three years ago, the Legislature of North Carolina made a small appropriation for a geological survey of that State. The discoveries of the first year developed the existence of copper and gold ores, drew to them the attention of capitalists, and have already increased the revenue of the State to five times the cost of the whole survey. In the second year, seams of the purest bituminous coal, some of them fifteen feet in thickness, extending through a region of some forty-five square miles, rewarded their investigations. It is estimated that every thousand acres of these seams will yield thirty millions of tons of bituminous coal of the best quality.

Monster Remains.—The remains of some gigantic animal have been dug up in Algeria. The head is not less than 85 centimetres from the teeth to the nape, and 48 across the bone of the forehead. The front part of the upper jaw has long teeth, and also tusks, similar to those of a wild boar. The legs of the animal are about the size of those of a horse, and from the bend of the ribs, it is supposed that its size must have been about four times that of an ordinary ox. Its head is somewhat similar to that of the hippopotamus, and its mouth must have been of extraordinary power.

VARIETY.

The Augsburg Gazette announces that the Emperor of Austria has definitely signed the decree consummating the emancipation of the peasantry in Bohemia, Moravia, Hungary, Servia, Arabia, the Banat, and the Waiewodina, from all statute or service-labor hitherto paid to the nobleman, or original owner of the soil. The decree prescribes that the peasant shall receive a farm with the necessary buildings on it, in a word, a homestead, as his own property. The worth of it is valued, leaving the peasant to pay it on easy terms, which are settled by a special commission, formed to mediate between the nobles and peasantry.

The cedars of Lebanon have diminished from a forest to a sacred grove, guarded by a priest and protected by a superstition. The prophecy of Isaiah has long since been fulfilled, and "Lebanon is turned into a fruitful field." "The rest of the trees of this forest are few, that a child may write them." The cedars of Lebanon scarcely occupy a space equal to two acres of ground! But Lebanon is a fruitful field; the mulberry tree yields its luscious fruit, and its more useful leaves, with graceful luxuriance; and in its valleys the harvests wave spontaneously in autumn.

"No nation is drunken," says Jefferson, in his letters, "where wine is cheap; and none sober where the dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as the common beverage." In Maderia, even with the peasantry, (says the Home Journal,) a drunkard is less reputable than a thief—necessity may make the one, nothing but inherent depravity the other. They drink wine always, and never to excess.

The New York Mirror, as illustrating the "upward tendencies" of every thing but newspapers, says the occupant of store No. 5 Astor House, who has heretofore paid $1,500 rent, is to pay $3,750 after the first of next May. The rent of stores in front of the Metropolitan Hotel has been raised from six hundred to two thousand dollars.

A gentleman traveling inside of a coach, was endeavoring, with considerable earnestness, to impress some arguments on a fellow passenger who was seated in the same vehicle, and who appeared rather dull of apprehension; at length, being slightly irritated, he exclaimed—"Why, Sir, it's as plain as A B C!" "That may be," quietly replied the other; "but I am D E F!"

The public journals of Amsterdam contain the following paragraph: "Some time back, letters from Brazil stated, that a slave had found at Bagagem a large diamond, for which 120,000 florins (240,000f.) had been refused. We now learn that it has been purchased by M. Willey, Minister of Holland to Rio Janeiro, for 881,250f."

The New York Journal of Commerce states that the clipper ship Racer, 1690 tons, was chartered from London to Sydney, N. S. W., for the round sum of £10,000, and from Calcutta back to London for £8,000. This is probably one of the greatest charters ever made by a merchant ship, whether the amount of money or the high rate of freight be considered.

The United States mint at Philadelphia was established in 1793, since which date the coinage therein has reached the sum of $322,228,868. The total coinage at all the United States mints, since their establishment, is three hundred and eighty-one million, seven hundred and ninety-seven thousand, two hundred and ninety-nine dollars.

There will be an extraordinary eclipse of the sun on the 25th of May next, such a one as none but the oldest inhabitants have witnessed in this vicinity. It will be similar to the great eclipse of 1806, since which there has been none resembling it nearer than that of 1830, when eleven-twelfths of the sun was obscured.

The most striking feature in the history of genius is its courage. Talent, on the contrary, is distinguished chiefly by its caution. The one goes forth, totally regardless of its costume, under the influence of prestige The other never suffers itself to be seen, until it has made its toilet, under the guidance of a becoming taste.

THE NEBRASKA BILL.

We are indebted to Senator Douglass for a copy of the "Bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, and the Report of the Committee on Territories." Nebraska and Kansas are placed on precisely the same footing, the only difference in the bills relating to the two Territories being in their names, and in that clause which defines their boundaries.

The limits assigned to Kansas are: "Beginning at a point on the western boundary of the State of Missouri, where the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the eastern boundary of New Mexico; thence north on said boundary to latitude thirty-eight; thence following said boundary westward to the summit of the highlands dividing the waters flowing into the Colorado of the West or Green river, from the waters flowing into the great basin; thence northward on said summit to the fortieth parallel of latitude; thence east on said parallel to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning."

The limits assigned to Nebraska are described in the first section of the Bill—which we copy, together with sections 9th and 10th, the only sections which have reference to Slavery, all the others relating to elections, duties of officers, &c.:—

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, That all that part of the territory of the United States included within the following limits, except such portions thereof as are hereinafter expressly exempted from the operations of this act, to wit: beginning at a point in the Missouri river where the fortieth parallel of north latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the summit of the highlands separating the waters flowing into Green river or Colorado of the West from the waters flowing into the great basin; thence northward on the said highlands to the summit of the Rocky mountains; thence on said summit northward to the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude; thence west on said parallel to the western boundary of the territory of Minnesota; thence southward on said boundary to the Missouri river; thence down the main channel of said river to the place of beginning, be, and the same is, hereby created into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Nebraska; and when admitted as a State or States, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the government of the United States from dividing said Territory into two or more Territories, in such manner and at such times as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of said Territory to any other State or Territory of the United States. Provided further, That nothing in this act contained, shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any Territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe is not without the consent of said tribe to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such Territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the Territory of Nebraska, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within the said Territory of Nebraska, or to affect the authority of the United States to make any regulation respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to the government to make if this act had never passed.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the judicial power of said Territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace. The supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and two associate justices, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum, and who shall hold a term at the seat of government of said Territory annually; and they shall hold their offices during the period of four years, and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified. The said Territory shall be divided into three judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each of said districts by one of the justices of the supreme court, at such times and places as may be prescribed by law; and the said judges shall, after their appointments respectively, reside in the districts which shall be assigned them. The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of the probate courts and of justices of the peace, shall be as limited by law: Provided, That justices of the peace shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy when the title or boundaries of land may be in dispute, or where the debt or sum claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars; and the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction. Each district court, or judge thereof, shall apoint its clerk, who shall also be the register in chancery, and shall keep his office at the place where the court may be held. Writs of error, bills of exception, and appeals, shall be allowed in all cases from the final decisions of said district courts to the supreme court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; but in no case removed to the supreme court shall trial by jury be allowed in said court. The supreme court, or the justices thereof, shall appoint its own clerk, and every clerk shall hold his office at the pleasure of the court, for which he shall have been appointed. Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of said supreme court shall be allowed, and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness, shall exceed one thousand dollars; except only that in all cases involving title to slaves, the said writs of error or appeals shall be allowed and decided by the said supreme court without regard to the value of the matter, property, or title in controversy; and except, also, that a writ of error or appeal shall also be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the said supreme court created by this act, or of any judge thereof, or of the district courts created by this act, or of any judge thereof, upon any writ of habeas corpus, involving the question of personal freedom; Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to or affect the provisions of the "act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," approved February twelfth, seventeen hundred and ninety-three, and the "act to amend and supplementary to the aforesaid act," approved September eighteenth, eighteen hundred and fifty; and each of the said district courts shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction, in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States; and the said supreme and district courts of the said Terrritory, and the respective judges thereof, shall and may grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases in which the same are granted by the judges of the United States in the District of Columbia; and the first six days of every term of said courts, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be appropriated to the trial of causes arising under the said Constitution and laws, and writs of error and appeal in all such cases shall be made to the supreme court of said Territory, the same as in other cases. The said clerk shall receive, in all such cases, the same fees which the clerks of the district courts of Utah Territory now receive for similar services.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," approved February 12, 1793, and the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend, and supplementary to, the aforesaid act," approved September 18, 1850, be and the same are hereby declared to extend to and be in full force within the limits of the said Territory of Nebraska.

Accompanying the Bill from which the foregoing extracts are taken, the Committee on Territories presented the following Report—which we copy to show our readers the kind of special pleading by which it is attempted to justify this wholesaling of free territory to slavery:—

The principal amendments, which your committee deem it their duty to commend to the favorable action of the Senate, in a special report, are those in which the principles established by the compromise measures of 1850, so far as they are applicable to territorial organizations, are proposed to be affirmed and carried into practical operation within the limits of the new territory.

The wisdom of those measures is attested, not less by their salutary and beneficial effects in allaying sectional agitation and restoring peace and harmony to an irritated and distracted people, than by the cordial and almost universal approbation with which they have been received and sanctioned by the whole country. In the judgment of your committee, those measures were intended to have a far more comprehensive and enduring effect than the mere adjustment of the difficulties arising out of the recent acquisition of Mexican territory. They were designed to establish certain great principles, which would not only furnish adequate remedies for existing evils, but in all time to come avoid the perils of a similar agitation, by withdrawing the question of slavery from the halls of Congress and the political arena, and committing it to the arbitrament of those who were immediately interested in and alone responsible for its consequences. With the view of conforming their action to what they regard the settled policy of the government, sanctioned by the approving voice of the American people, your committee have deemed it their duty to incorporate and perpetuate in their territorial bill the principles and spirit of those measures. If any other considerations were necessary to render the propriety of this course imperative upon the committee, they may be found in the fact that the Nebraska country occupies the same relative position to the slavery question as did New Mexico and Utah when those territories were organized.

It was a disputed point, whether slavery was prohibited by law in the country acquired from Mexico. On the one hand, it was contended, as a legal proposition, that, slavery having been prohibited by the enactments of Mexico, according to the laws of nations, we received the country with all its local laws and domestic institutions attached to the soil, so far as they did not conflict with the Constitution of the United States; and that a law either protecting or prohibiting slavery was not repugnant to that instrument, as was evinced by the fact that one-half of the States of the Union tolerated, while the other half prohibited, the institution of slavery. On the other hand, it was insisted that, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, every citizen had a right to remove to any Territory of the Union, and carry his property with him under the protection of law, whether that property consisted in persons or things. The difficulties arising from this diversity of opinion were greatly aggravated by the fact, that there were many persons on both sides of the legal controversy who were unwilling to abide the decision of the courts on the legal matters in dispute. Thus, among those who claimed that the Mexican laws were still in force, and consequently that slavery was already prohibited in those territories by valid enactment, there were many who insisted upon Congress making the matter certain, by enacting another prohibition. In like manner, some of those who argued that the Mexican laws had ceased to have any binding force, and that the Constitution tolerated and protected slave property in those territories, were unwilling to trust the decision of the courts upon that point, and insisted that Congress should by direct enactment remove all legal obstacles to the introduction of slaves into those territories.

Such being the character of the controversy in respect to the territory acquired from Mexico, a similar question has arisen in regard to the right to hold slaves in the proposed territory of Nebraska when the Indian laws shall be withdrawn and the country thrown open to emigration and settlement. By the 8th section of "an act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union to an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain territories," approved March 6, 1820, it was provided: "That, in all that territory ceded by France to the United States under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, not included within the limits of the State contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be and is hereby forever prohibited: Provided always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any State or territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service as aforesaid."

Under this section, as in the case of the Mexican law in New Mexico and Utah, it is a disputed point whether slavery is prohibited in the Nebraska country by valid enactment. The decision of this question involves the constitutional power of Congress to pass laws prescribing and regulating the domestic institutions of the various territories of the Union. In the opinion of those eminent statesmen, who hold that Congress is invested with no rightful authority to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the territories, the 8th section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri is null and void; while the prevailing sentiment in large portions of the Union sustains the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States secures to every citizen an inalienable right to move into any of the territories with his property, of whatever kind and description, and to hold and enjoy the same under the sanction of law. Your committee do not feel themselves called upon to enter into the discusion of these controverted questions. They involve the same grave issues which produced the agitation, the sectional strife, and the fearful struggle of 1850. As Congress deemed it wise and prudent to refrain from deciding the matters in controversy then, either by affirming or repealing the Mexican laws, or by an act declaratory of the true intent of the Constitution and the extent of the protection afforded by it to slave property in the territories, so your committee are not prepared now to recommend a departure from the course pursued on that memorable occasion, either by affirming or repealing the 8th section of the Missouri act, or by any act declaratory of the meaning of the Constitution in respect to the legal points in dispute.

Your committee deem it fortunate for the peace of the country, and the security of the Union, that the controversy then resulted in the adoption of the compromise measures, which the two great political parties, with singular unanimity, have affirmed as a cardinal article of their faith, and proclaimed to the world as a final settlement of the controversy and an end of the agitation. A due respect, therefore, for the avowed opinions of senators, as well as a proper sense of patriotic duty, enjoins upon your committee the propriety and necessity of a strict adherence to the principles, and even a literal adoption of the enactments of that adjustment, in all their territorial bills, so far as the same are not locally inapplicable. Those enactments embrace, among other things, less material to the matters under consideration, the following provisions:

"When admitted as a State, the said territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."

"That the legislative power and authority of said territory shall be vested in the governor and a legislative assembly."

"That the legislative power of said territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act; but no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents."

"Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of said supreme court shall be allowed, and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party or other competent witness, shall exceed one thousand dollars, except only that, in all cases involving title to slaves, the said writs of error or appeals shall be allowed and decided by the said supreme court, without regard to the value of the matter, property, or title in controversy; and except, also, that a writ of error or appeal shall also be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, from the decisions of the said supreme court created by this act, or of any judge thereof, or of the district courts created by this act, or of any judge thereof, upon any writ of habeas corpus involving the question of personal freedom; and each of the said district courts shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States; and the said supreme and district courts of the said territory, and the respective judges thereof, shall and may grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases in which the same are granted by the judges of the United States in the District of Columbia."

To which may be added the following proposition affirmed by the act of 1850, known as the fugitive slave law:—

That the provisions of the "act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," approved Feb. 12, 1793, and the provisions of the "act to amend and supplementary to the aforesaid act, approved September 18, 1850, shall extend to and be force in all the organized territories," as well as in the various States of the Union.

From these provisions it is apparent, that the compromise measures of 1850 affirm and rest upon the following propositions.

First. That all questions pertaining to slavery in the territories, and in the new States to be formed therefrom, are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein, by their appropriate representatives, to be chosen by them for that purpose.

Second. That "all cases involving title to slaves," and "questions of personal freedom," are referred to the adjudication of the local tribunals, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Third. That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, in respect to fugitives from service, are to be carried into faithful execution in all "the organized territories" the same as in the States. The substitute for the bill which your committee have prepared, and which is commended to the favorable action of the Senate, proposes to carry these propositions and principles into practical operation, in the precise language of the compromise measures of 1850.

"YOU LED ME TO CHRIST."

So said one who formerly sat under our ministry, when after a separation of years we renewed our acquaintance with her in her last sickness. As we entered the chamber where she lay in the last stages of consumption, turning toward us with a radiance almost celestial, she exclaimed, "You led me to Christ. I was brought up in error. I lived in worldliness. I felt at ease in my sins. Your sermons awakened me. Your conversation enlightened me. You led me to Christ—and my husband, and my sister also. I am so glad to see you before I die. I am at peace. Christ is precious. I am going to be with my Savior. You led me to Christ."

Our emotions found a brief, tearful, broken utterance in prayer; and the day following, we learned that she had gone to be with Christ.

No joy, saving that only of personal communion with God, can equal that of leading a soul to Christ. No other act has such a far-reaching influence, no other act lays hold so directly upon eternal interests, or brings us into such living sympathy with heaven.

We recently received a letter from a foreign missionary, that revives one of the most tender associations of former years. "Can I ever forget," he says, "that through college you were my chosen friend? For years we sat side by side in the same recitation-room. We were side by side in the boarding-house. We investigated together the same subjects, we read the same books, engaged in the same recreations. And more than this—we kneeled together at the same mercy-seat. Can I ever forget, dear friend of my youth, that, when running in the paths of thoughtlessness and sin, forgetting the early instructions of my sainted mother, lulling my conscience to sleep, and every month throwing off some restraint, you took me by the hand, and with more than a brother's tenderness led me to the cross of Christ? And though our homes are now on different sides of the globe, and we perhaps shall never meet again till we meet in the better land, we no doubt both of us often revert with more than a passing interest to the association of those early years."

Almost every Christian can recall some such association with one and another whom he has led to Christ. And doubtless every one who has had this experience, will testify to the fullness and the permanence of the joy it brings to his own soul. Why then do we ever relax our efforts for the conversion of souls? For what earthly gratification are we willing to forego this high celestial blessedness?

Paul looked forward to the recognition of those whom he had been instrumental in leading to Christ, as one of the highest of the secondary delights of heaven—those delights that range next to that of seeing Christ face to face. "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? For ye are our glory and joy."

With such anticipations of heavenly joy resulting from the conversion of souls, shall we not give ourselves with increasing and unceasing earnestness to these labors of love? How thrilling the welcome at the gate of heaven, from one and another now rejoicing in its glory, "You led me to Christ!"

A SISTER'S INFLUENCE.—"I was intoxicated but once," said a young man to us, the other day. "I shall never forget it. In company with several jovial fellows, I was induced to drink pretty freely, and by the time I got home, I knew scarcely where I was or what I was doing, I was put to bed, and how long I lay there I don't know; but when I awoke, my sister was sitting beside the bed engaged in sewing. The moment her eyes fell on my face, she burst into a flood of tears and wept as if her heart would break. Overwhelmed with shame for my conduct, I then formed a resolution that I would never get drunk again; I have adhered to it for some years and I mean to keep it!" [Mer. Ledg.

THOUGHTS IN A CHURCHYARD.

In the far West the sunlight's glow is fading,
And crimson clouds are floating over head,
Like the bright banners of a host of angels,
Waving above the city of the dead.

Softly the evening breezes whisper round me,
Rustling the grass above each quiet breast;
And like a gem upon the brow of even,
One bright star glitters in the glowing West.

Let no vain thoughts, no dark, unholy passions,
Disturb the peaceful calmness of my breast,
Here where the wicked ever cease from troubling,
Here where earth's weary children are at rest.

Here let me pause, and read the simple story
Of one who perished in life's early prime,—
Of one whose bark, while the fair sky was brightest,
Was wrecked and lost upon the shores of time.

Ah! who can tell what bright and fairy visions,
What joyous hopes, once filled thy active brain!
And who can know the wild and bitter anguish,
When o'er thy corse the tear-drops fell like rain!

And here lies one, whose footsteps were aweary
With the long toilsome march of this sad life;
One who had bravely fought life's ceaseless battle,
And full of years had fallen in the strife.

And here a maiden, fair and young, is sleeping,
A pure, frail flower, the stream of life beside;
In its full bloom by death's chill frost 'twas blighted,
And swept away by Jordan's rolling tide.

And here a little mound, with roses blooming,
Tells where a child hath been laid down to rest—
Sad place for one whose dimpled cheek's soft pillow.
Hath been a tender mother's faithful breast.

Ah! little one, a mother's heart is lonely,
Since angels bore thee to the better shore;
In love's bright chain one precious link is broken,
One gladsome voice shall never greet her more.

Here is one little spot of earth, more holy
Than any other in the world, to me;
'Tis here my mother rests in quiet slumber,
From earthly pain and sorrow ever free.

Here let me linger while the day is dying,
And round me gathers evening's shadowy gloom—
Alas! a shadow hath been on my spirit,
Since she hath slept within this lonely tomb.

But when the trumpet of the great archangel
Shall peal with echoing blast through earth and heaven,
Then shall the dead arise to life immortal,
Then shall the fetters of the grave be riven.

RELIGION IN COLLEGES.

The last Fifth-day in February has for a number of years been extensively observed as a day of fasting and prayer for Colleges. In anticipation of the occasion, a Committee of the Society of Inquiry in Amherst College made a brief statement respecting the condition of several Colleges in New England and the Middle States—which we copy as containing facts of permanent interest and value.

In Waterville College, Maine, there are 90 students. Of this number 36 are professors of religion, 20 have the Gospel ministry in view, and 2 intend to become missionaries to foreign lands. The students sustain two weekly religious meetings. There is an association called the Boardman Missionary Society, which has for its object the promotion of religious knowledge and piety among its members. One interesting case of conversion has occurred during the past year; others are thoughtful, but still out of Christ.

Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., contains 230 students. About 60 are professors of religion—a large part of whom are expecting to enter the ministry. Many are discussing the question of their duty to the heathen, with a willingness to go wherever it may call them. Separate prayer-meetings are sustained by the different classes on Wednesday, and a union-meeting on Friday. There are two religious societies, namely, the Theological and Society of Inquiry. A greater religious interest than usual has prevailed during the past year. Christians have been more prayerful and active, and the impenitent more thoughtful and inquiring. There have been twelve or fifteen cases of conversion, several of which strikingly illustrate the power of divine grace. "We have much to be thankful for, and much to deplore. God has blessed us far beyond our deserts."

Middlebury College, Vt.—Number of students, 63. About 30 are professors of religion. The exact number studying for the ministry is not known. The Philadelphian Society meets every Friday evening to discuss religious questions, and on Sunday morning for prayer and conference. Class prayer-meetings are held every week. There have been no conversions during the past year, but an elevated tone of moral feeling prevails among the students.

University of Vermont.—Number of students, 121; professors of religion, 32; studying for the ministry, 21; intending to become missionaries, 2. Weekly class meetings are held by the students, and also one general meeting for all who are disposed to attend. There is a society for religious inquiry, which holds its meetings weekly. There have been no conversions during the past year, and but little religious interest. At present, however, we feel much encouraged to hope and pray.

At Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., there are 126 students; 51 are professors of religion, 31 are intending to enter the ministry, and 2 propose to become missionaries to foreign lands. There are two weekly prayer-meetings sustained by the students; also, a "Society of Christian Research," the object of which is to promote religious knowledge, and to aid in the missionary enterprise, by prayer and contribution. It supports a beneficiary at the Batticotta Seminary, Ceylon. There has been but little deep religious interest during the past year. It seems at the present to be increasing.

Madison University, Hamilton, N. Y., contains 208 students; 175 are professors of religion; 137 have the ministry in view, and 18 the missionary field. The students hold three weekly prayer-meetings. The monthly concert of prayer for missions is held on the first Monday of every month, at which time the regular college exercises are suspended. There are three societies for the promotion of religious knowledge, namely, the Society for Inquiry, embracing nearly all the professors of religion. A report of some missionary station is read before the society on the first Sunday evening of every month. Second, the Eastern Association, comprising those who expect to labor in the foreign field. The objects of this association are to pray for and obtain information concerning the success of missions. Third, the Western Association, embracing those who intend to labor in the ministry at home. There has been rather more than the usual degree of religious interest during the past year; 20 cases of conversion have occurred.

Brown University, Providence, R. I., contains 270 students; 70 are professors of religion, 30 are studying for the ministry, and 2 propose to become missionaries. Two prayer-meetings are held during the week; the classes meet separately on Friday evening, and together Wednesday evening. Those who are not professors seldom attend. The usual monthly concert is here observed, at which time one of the college professors gives an account of the progress of missions throughout the world. There is also a monthly meeting of the Society of Missionary Inquiry.

Rutger's College, New Brunswick, N. J.—Number of students, 88; professors of religion, 24; studying for the ministry, 18 or more. A weekly prayer meeting is held by the students. There is a Bible Society at this college—an auxiliary of the American—which pays into the treasury of the Parent Society about $50 annually.

At Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut, there are 103 students, 27 of whom are studying for the ministry. The number of professors of religion is 46. There is a society called the Missionary Association, which has for its object the promotion of religious knowledge. The students often meet for prayer and religious instruction.

At Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine, there are 176 students; 44 are professors of religion, the majority of whom will probably study for the ministry; but one is known to be fully decided to become a missionary. There are meetings for all the students on Saturday evening and Sunday morning. The classes also hold separate prayer-meetings. There is a society called the "Praying Circle," embracing all the pious students. The past year has been marked by sobriety and good attendance on religious services. There have been two hopeful conversions; but further than this, no special indications of God's presence.

Williams College, Williamstown, Mass.—Number of students, 231; of these 110 are professors of religion, 61 have the gospel ministry in view, and 6 intend to become missionaries. There have been six conversions during the past year. Religious meetings: The President lectures to the students on Saturday evening. Sunday morning, all the classes meet for conference. Prayer-meetings are held on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday, from one to two o'clock; and also on Friday evening. The Mills Theological Society holds meetings alternately for the study of the Scriptures and reading essays on missionary subjects and reports of the different stations. The religious interest during the past year has been good—at times deep and general, though there have been fewer conversions than in some previous years.

Amherst College, Amherst, Mass., contains 208 students; of these, 141 are professors of religion, 87 are expecting to enter the ministry, and 21 the field of foreign missions. At the commencement of the past year considerable religious interest was manifested. Christians were more active, and the impenitent more serious. Some were inquiring, and a few expressed the hope of forgiven sin. During the year there have been ten hopeful conversions. Class prayer-meetings are held on Saturday evening, and on Sunday morning a general meeting of all the classes. The society meets once in two weeks to discuss religious questions, and obtain missionary intelligence. At the monthly concert, one of its members reads a sketch of the origin and progress of some missionary station, and another a dissertation on the general subject of missions.

Summary.—Number of colleges reported, 12; students, 1486; professors of religion, 633; preparing for the ministry, 350; intending to become missionaries, 45; conversions during the year, 43.

AMHERST COLLEGE, Feb. 8, 1854.

PRAYING FOR MINISTERS.

An aged colored man, and a godly member of the church, called on his pastor and remarked to him, "You have preached some good sermons lately—better than usual." The minister replied, that perhaps the people's ears were better open to hear than usual. "Well," said the old man, "there is a great deal in that too; but I think somebody has been praying for you." The minister said he hoped so; for that minister has a hard time of it for whom no one in his congregation prays.

Reader, do you pray for your minister? You expect great things from him, and if he does not preach well, you feel at liberty to find fault with him. Have you called on God to help him? I do not ask if you have prayed for him in the prayer-meeting or in the family. Do you enter your closet on Sabbath morning and earnestly wrestle with God for him, feeling that he greatly needs help to preach the everlasting gospel; and that you cannot venture to the house of God without seeking a blessing for him, lest you should come away unprofited—lest no good should be accomplished that day?

If you are conscious of deep neglect of this duty, and this privilege, we beg of you to reflect a little. Your minister is a man; encompassed with infirmities as other men are, and liable to many temptations. It is very important that his mind should be composed and elevated above the cares and vexations of life, when he sits down to prepare a sermon; and such, especially, should be his case when he goes to the sanctuary to conduct the worship of God, and deliver his message. Consider the malice of Satan against ministers; how he makes it his business to distract and divert their minds to prevent them from preaching well, or from making due preparation. Prayer has power with God to prevent his schemes and protect your minister. Do you pray for your minister? If not, will you begin?

SABBATH-BREAKING PARTNERSHIPS.

We have been sitting with pen in hand for half an hour, or more, pondering upon the best manner of discussing this important subject. It is our wish to discuss it in such a way as will give no offense. We wish, at all events, to say nothing but what will stand the test of truth. We may not succeed in saving the feelings of our brethren, but if we may be instrumental in saving them from their sins, we shall feel that we have not labored in vain.

By Sabbath-breaking partnerships we mean those associations for business which involve the breach of the Sabbath on the part of one or more of the firm, or on the part of those in its employ. These associations have multiplied among us, within a few years past, causing not a little anxiety with some as to what will be the final result. There are some, who fear that the result will be most disastrous to the cause of the Sabbath, to say nothing of other unhappy consequences; and they consider it high time that the subject were agitated earnestly, till those who are implicated shall see, either that they are sinning against God, or that their course is justified by the Scriptures of Truth.

If we understand the Fourth Commandment, it requires abstinence from labor, not only on the part of the individual himself, but also on the part of all who are in his employ. "Thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant." It makes it a man's duty to control his own household—his farm—his shop—every place, in short, over which his lawful jurisdiction extends, and for the management of which he is in any way responsible. If it is wrong for him to break the Sabbath himself, it is wrong for him to employ others to break it. A person who would employ another to commit an act of murder, is accounted as a murderer himself. He that hires a ruffian to set fire to his neighbor's house, is no less guilty than the ruffian himself. And he that employs another to rob the possessor of his goods, promising to make him a sharer in the spoils, is too flagrantly an accomplice in the crime to stand justified before an honest community. Now, if our inability to see, that he who employs others to break the Sabbath is not just as guilty as if he broke it himself, argues obtuseness of intellect, we hope that some body will endeavor, by that plainness of speech and simplicity of illustration which cannot fail to impress the dullest understanding, to set the matter in its true light.

The Sabbath-keeper by his profession declares that the keeping of Sunday, to the displacement and violation of the day designated as the Sabbath in the Fourth Commandment, is a sin. He believes that the substitution of Sunday for the seventh day was accomplished by the Man of Sin. He hesitates not to say, that to keep Sunday instead of the Sabbath is to symbolize with Popery. He says that it is to make void the commandment of God in order to uphold a human tradition. He enters into controversy upon this point, wherever he goes, and preaches it to be the duty of all to keep the Sabbath just as God appointed. It is one of the duties enjoined in the Law, he says, and the transgression of the law is SIN.

But what says the Sabbath-keeper by his business arrangements? An observer of the first day of the week proposes a copartnership, the condition of which is, that the establishment shall do business on the Sabbath-day. The Sabbath-keeper consents, on condition that he himself shall be exempt from all active participation in what is done on that day. He consents that his partner shall work, and, of course, that all the employees, servants, or agents, that may be required for the management of the concern, shall work also. Not only so; he consents to receive, and appropriate to his own use, as his lawful property, a portion of the profits that may arise out of this Sabbath labor. In yielding this consent, does he not say that to work on the Sabbath-day is no sin? Does he not flatly contradict his religious profession?

For, what is the nature of a copartnership? Does not each member of the firm work for the other? Even admitting that there are no clerks, journeymen, or under-servants of any sort, in the establishment,—none but the partners themselves, who of course are equals, and have equal rights,—still each one serves the other. For there is no reason why two or more persons should enter into partnership, except the mutual service which they render one another, thereby rendering the profits of the concern greater for each, than if he carried on business by himself alone. Thus, when a Sunday-keeper proposes partnership with an observer of the Sabbath, this is the inducement which he holds out:—"I will serve you," says he, "on the Sabbath-day—a very profitable day for business—thereby augmenting your gains much above what they would be, if you were in business by yourself, and should shut up the establishment on that day." The Sabbath-keeper agrees to the proposal, and by that very agreement says, "I consent that you shall work for me on the Sabbath."

This, we take it, is the plain, common-sense view of the matter. Turn and twist it as we may, we think it comes to this in the end. And if the Sabbath-keeper can thus deliberately say to his partner, "I agree that you shall work for me on the Sabbath," he either flatly contradicts his religious profession, and says that to work on the Sabbath is no sin, or else deliberately makes up his mind to commit sin.

Let it not be replied, that the partners, being equal, each one acts for himself, and is responsible for himself. For though each acts for himself, he does not act only for himself. He acts also for the other. He acts for himself in the same sense as the common hired laborer acts for himself, who, though he works for himself in respect to the wages he hopes to receive, works for the man who employs him also. If he is hired to work on the Sabbath-keeper's farm, on the Sabbath-day, or in his shop, or counting-house, there is no sophistry which will make it appear that he acts only for himself. The employer is guilty also. And when the Sunday-keeping member of a business firm manages the business on the Sabbath-day, he does it not only for himself, but for the other also. He is employed, nay, to all intents and purposes, hired, by the other to do it. The act of hiring is not done formally, from week to week, but it enters into the very nature of the contract by which they agree to do business jointly, in partnership. Brethren, is it right—is it a lawful contract? Does it involve nothing of sin against Him who said of the Sabbath-day, "In it thou shalt not do any work; thou, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant?" T. B. B.

Education.

It would perhaps have been more in obedience to the laws of order, had I commenced my former article with the heading which designates the line of thought for the present one, and may for others to come. But as "what is written is written,"—aye, and printed too—we will let that pass.

Education is a term of very comprehensive signification. It embraces all the laws of mind and human actions. There is heart education as well as head education, and it is doubtful whether any education of the latter, which does not reach the former, is of any real benefit; and sure it is, that that education of the mind which is not sanctified by a good heart, does often prove itself a curse.

But my present purpose is to call the attention of parents to that department of education which embraces the arts and sciences, and refers more especially to the business transactions of life. I think it will be admitted, upon reflection, that every pursuit in life requires an education peculiar to itself. It is not proposed to assert, that even in this instance a general education is not desirable, and even necessary, but that a special and particular education is necessary for each of the different departments of human industry. If the merchant and surveyor need instruction in their particular branches of labor, so do the engineer and the architect. Nor is that great and indispensable branch of human industry, farming, exempt from this rule. Our opinion is immovably fixed, that the world suffers more this day for the want of a thorough education in all the branches of farming and housewifery, than in any and perhaps than in all other industrial pursuits. Look at thousands upon thousands of acres of land, not only indifferently but unskillfully cultivated throughout our vast country. How little is known of the adaptation of the different kinds of soil for this or that kind of grain, or this or that class of vegetables. For this reason, and for this only, years of toil are rewarded with poverty and disappointment, and a train of evils at the thought of which the heart sickens. The same may be said concerning the improvement of those domestic animals which in their turn contribute so much to the wealth and happiness of man.

Also, how much of human happiness and wealth depends upon the proper discharge of domestic duties. It is an old saying, that "the wife can throw out with a teaspoon as fast as the husband can throw in with a shovel." But to say nothing of the absolute necessity of domestic economy, in order to the wealth of the thousands of hearts that have sunk under the weight of an up-hill struggle for the want of this, let us consider for one moment the happiness or unhappiness, as the case may be, to human life, as connected with this subject. As the heart is the seat of animal life, so is the family, the house, the kitchen, the center and seat of domestic and social felicity. Let me ask the reader, especially the youthful reader, to pause for one moment and think of a home where the presiding geniuses are industry, neatness, economy, and genial hearts! I have not mentioned riches; they are too sordid to be ranked with the superior excellencies above named. But how are we to have such homes, if our daughters are not so educated as to fit them to become the embodiment of these virtues?

And now, dear parents, on looking over the fields of human industry, and upon the realities of life, and seeing how much of the happiness, comfort, and real success of life, depends upon the education of your children, both as to its character and amount, may I earnestly press upon your attention the question, whether you are doing your whole duty towards them? Do you patronize the district schools—the select schools—the academies—the colleges of our country? Do you furnish them with extensive and first-rate newspaper reading? Or, if they read at all, do you allow them to read the silly trash which forms the reading of so many of the young of the present age? Do you purchase them good books, and encourage their reading them? Do you throw your whole soul into the question of thoroughly and truly educating your children? N. V. H.

THE NEBRASKA BILL—PROTESTS.

From almost every part of the country, petitions, remonstrances and protests against the Nebraska Bill are going to Washington. A solemn protest against that bill, or any other modification or repeal of the Missouri Compromise, has been prepared and sent out through all New England by a committee of Boston ministers, consisting of Drs. Charles Lowell, Lyman Beecher, Baron Stow, and Rev. S. Streeter. It is hoped that every Protestant clergyman in Boston will sign it. In New York a similar paper has been extensively circulated, and signed by clergymen of all denominations. We copy it in hope that it will serve as a model for men of all classes to represent to Congress their opposition to this nefarious bill:—

"The undersigned, clergymen of various denominations in the city of New York and vicinity, desire respectfully and earnestly to remonstrate against the bill for the organization of new territories, now before Congress, allowing the introduction of slavery into a region consecrated to freedom by the plighted faith of the nation, in long-standing and 'irrepealable' enactments, and by the divine and natural claims of religion and of liberty.

"We remonstrate on the ground that the parties whose rights and interests are, and are to be, affected cannot be restored to the position of equality occupied by them respectively, before the enactments solemnly established in 1820. The security for freedom then given to the one party, can not be taken away without the grossest violation of justice, good faith, and law.

"We remonstrate, because the deliberate and unnecessary extension of the evils of slavery would be positive guilt, and, as committed by Congress, the guilt of the whole country, and not of any particular State alone; and we feel bound to protest, in the name of religion and humanity, against such legislation.

"The responsibility of determining the prevailing institutions of future generations of many millions of immortal beings, is inconceivably great and solemn. We remonstrate against preparing the way, or providing the means, of establishing slavery as a part of the radical and organic life of a vast future empire in our land.

"We remonstrate against such a proceedure, as tending to produce alienation of feeling between different sections of our beloved country, great agitation and perilous dissension, and exposing us to the righteous judgments of Almighty God."

DANIEL'S 2,300 DAYS AND 70 WEEKS.

BY BENJAMIN CLARKE.

The National Rights of the Jews.

As there are now many professing Christians who say that the Most High will never again recognize the Jews as a distinct nation, or a distinct people, and that now, under the gospel dispensation, "there is neither Jew nor Greek," &c., I would respectfully inquire whether they have any national rights; and if they have any, what are some of those rights?

How long was the seed of Israel to continue a distinct nation? "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar—the Lord of hosts is his name—if those ordinances depart from before me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me forever. Thus saith the Lord, If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, I will also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, saith the Lord." Jer. 31 : 35—37. Please read this whole chapter, and see that it speaks of the gospel dispensation. We learn from this scripture, that Israel is to continue a nation, that is, a distinct people, so long as the sun and moon and stars rule the day and night. They are to be made "a strong nation," and "the Lord shall reign over them forever." Micah 4 : 6.

Were the Jews—the house of Jacob—to be scattered among the other nations of the world? "Behold, the eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth; saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord. For lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a seive, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth. All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword, which say, The evil shall not overtake nor prevent us. In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old; that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen which are called by my name, [that is understood to be, Gentile Christians, called by the name of Christ,] saith the Lord that doeth this. And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens, and eat the fruit of them. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord God." Amos 9 : 8—15.

It will be seen, that the above scripture is in part fulfilled, so far as relates to their being scattered among the nations; but that they never have yet been gathered in fulfillment of the last part of this scripture, is evident. In looking after that people and their future national rights, we should carefully distinguish their former return from Babylon's captivity, and their future return from their present scattered state.

Were the Jews to be gathered a second time to their land, after they were gathered from their Babylonian captivity? "And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek, and his rest shall be glorious. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left" (from many places) "and from the islands of the sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and shall gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." Isa. 11 : 10—12. This gathering of Israel and Judah seems to be after the Gentiles have sought this glorious rest of Christ the ensign.

The Jews were to be given up until a set time. "Therefore will he give them up until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth; then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel." Micah 5 : 3. "Until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in," Rom. 11 : 25, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. And verily I (Jesus) say unto you, Ye shall not see me until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." The word until, in these scriptures, does not mean that they should be cast away forever; but "there is hope in thine end, with the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border." Jer. 31 : 17.

Now, if such plain scripture language as the above quotations shows any thing, it is, that "God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew." And to say now, that "there is neither Jew nor Greek," (when the same scripture says, also, that "there is neither male nor female,") does not prove that the Jews shall not continue a distinct nation. Even after the resurrection, "when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory," his twelve apostles also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

We would therefore most respectfully and most earnestly request all enlightened nations, and their governments, who have an eye to the rights of man, that they have also an eye to the national rights of the Jews. For we Gentiles are somewhat indebted to them, especially for the Scriptures of truth.

[To be continued.]

[ERRATA.—In my last, under the question, "When do the 2,300 years end?" for 466 read 446 years, &c. The fifth line from the bottom of the col. for "Governors" read "Governor."]

COMMUNION.

The subject of communion is one which, for a long time, has much exercised my mind. Whether it is owing to my early education, or to the truth in the case, I have always found it difficult to coincide with the views of restricted communionists. And although, for the sake of harmony, I have conformed in my practice to restricted communion, yet my conscience has been severely tried upon so doing. It has been my aim, (in theory at least,) to model my Christian profession after Christ Jesus, and his Apostles, wherein they followed Christ.

It seems to me, that the Lord's Supper was given to Christians as such, irrespective of whatever else might be their imperfections. I have examined much that has been written in favor of close communion, but have failed to be convinced of the validity of the arguments, or of the error of my views. As I do not intend, at this time, to argue the question, I will only add, that the present divided and sectarian state of the nominal church, I view as antagonistic to pure Christianity, and contrary to the unity of the church, for which Christ prayed. S. S. GRISWOLD.

SABBATH-KEEPERS IN WESTFIELD, PA.—A business letter from R. L. Davis, dated Westfield, Tioga Co., Pa., Feb. 26, 1854, says: "Perhaps it would be interesting to you to know, that three families—two in Westfield, and one (Eld. H. Kelly) in Chatham, of the Christian denomination—embraced the Bible Sabbath last summer, and formed themselves into a Sabbath-keeping church, and hold meetings once in two weeks. There are several persons in Clymer, favorably inclined to the Sabbath; two families have kept it some years, and three or four have acknowledged its claims. Religion has been revived in Clymer, (south of Westfield,) and the east part of Westfield, this winter; and a revival is now in progress in Brookfield, adjoining Westfield on the north."

ORDINATION.—A Council of delegates from the 1st Alfred, Independence, Richburg, and 2d Alfred Seventh-day Baptist churches, met on the 2d of March, at Amity, by request of Scio and Amity churches, to take into consideration the ordination of brother CHARLES ROWLEY to the work of the ministry. After examination, it was unanimously resolved, that their request should be granted. The consecrating prayer was offered by Eld. J. Kenyon, charge given L. Andrus, hand of fellowship by Eld. D. E. Maxson, benediction by C. Rowley. T. E. BABCOCK, Mod.
S. BURDICK, Sec.

THE MEMORIAL.—The ninth number of the SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MEMORIAL has been delayed beyond the regular time for issuing it; but it is now all printed, and will be sent to subscribers in the course of the present week. It will contain a portrait of Eld. James H. Cochran; biographies of James H. Cochran, John Crandall, Jonathan Davis, and Jacob Ayres; the early history of the Westerly (now 1st Hopkinton) Church; and a continuation of the history of Seventh-day Baptist Missions.

SUNNY SIDE.—Under this head, we find in one of our Baptist exchanges the following paragraphs, showing that there is indeed a sunny side to the life of some ministers of the gospel:—

The Baptist Church in Tarrytown, besides increasing the salary of their pastor, the Rev. A. P. Buel, one hundred dollars a year, have recently presented him a donation of two hundred and forty dollars. This church a few years ago was a feeble body, aided by the State Convention and Home Mission Society. It is now able to do generous deeds, and has the disposition to do them.

A Baptist pastor a few miles from New York city,—we are not sure that we have permission to give the name of our friend,—received a note on New Year's, expressing a grateful appreciation of his ministry, and the hope that it would remain permanent, and enclosing a check for $1000, the gift of three brethren, whose praise is in our churches.

Another Baptist pastor, still nearer us, received at the same time the title to property valued at $1000, with other similar demonstrations. And, what is more, our good brother is used to just such things.

GRAND LIGNE MISSION.—We learn from the annual report of the mission at Grand Ligne, Canada, for 1853, recently published, that the Lord has greatly blessed his servants in that part of his moral vineyard. The report says:—

"The year 1853 may be numbered among the brightest in the history of the mission. Never have there been so many calls for the efforts of our colporteurs, never have they been more active, or found more access to educated and influential persons. The work of evangelization has been prosecuted vigorously, especially in the new field, comprising the parishes of St. Isidore, St. Remi, and St. Constant; several families in these places have abjured the Romish faith to follow the Gospel. If we add to these about a dozen in the parishes around St. Mary and St. Pie, and in isolated places within the limits of our missionary field, who have become Protestants during the year 1853, we can number some fifty adults, besides as many children, naturally brought under the influence of the truth."

PROF. FINNEY IN CINCINNATI.—The Western Christian Advocate, a spirited Methodist paper issued from Cincinnati, makes the following note of Prof. Finney, who has recently been preaching in that city:—

"Rev. Prof. Finney, of Oberlin, O., has been before the religious public as a preacher and revivalist for some twenty-five years past. He was not long since in London, and during several months' labor there accomplished a large amount of good. The doctrine by which Mr. Finney made himself notorious in the earliest days of his ministry, namely, self-conversionism, he appears to have given up. We heard him on the topic of confessing and cleansing last Friday evening, in the Presbyterian church, corner of Fourth and John streets in this city, and were much pleased with his discourse. Mr. Finney is quite bald, and wears his beard wholly unshaven, the upper lip excepted. He preached for over an hour, and with great feeling and earnestness, and yet there seemed to be no movement in the congregation."

THE WAY TO TREAT A MINISTER.—Rev. Dr. Cox, for seventeen years past pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, has been compelled by ill health to desist from ministerial labors, and is about to retire to a farm he has purchased near Owego, N. Y. The church, after accepting his resignation, took a fancy to express their gratitude for past services, and their regret for his loss; and accordingly tendered him $6,500 to pay for the farm he had bought. The offer was accepted, and the entire sum raised by voluntary subscriptions in one week.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—The will of the late Elliot Cresson, of Philadelphia, distributes $127,000 for philanthropic objects—including $50,000 for the American Sunday School Union, $10,000 for the School of Design, $10,000 to the Historical Society, $10,000 for a monument for William Penn, $10,000 to the Episcopal Missions to Port Cresson, Africa, $5,000 to the Episcopal Seminary at Alexandria, $5,000 to the Hospital for the Insane, $5,000 to Philadelphia City for planting trees, besides sums to various benevolent institutions of Philadelphia.

METHODISTS AND THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.—The Methodists are fast coming to estimate aright the advantages of a good theological training. We see it stated, that another Methodist Biblical Institute, similar to that in Concord, N. H., is to be established in the vicinity of Chicago, and to go into operation next December. The question of a Theological Seminary of the highest grade, to be established somewhere in the vicinity of New York, for the benefit of the same denomination, is now mooted by some of its distinguished members.

REVIVAL IN NEW YORK.—The Baptist Church in Norfolk-st, New York, has been for some time past the scene of much religious interest. The preaching has been done principally by Eld. Lewis Raymond. On the first Sunday in February twenty-five persons were added to the church by baptism, and baptisms have been frequent since. Among the candidates for baptism last Sunday was Mrs. Armitage, wife of the pastor of the church.

JEWISH SYNAGOGUES IN NEW YORK.—There are at the present time nineteen congregations of Jews in the city of New York; of whom ten use the Polish form of prayer, five the German, one Portuguese, one Holland, one Bohemian, and one Reform. All but two have readers or ministers, and three have lecturers.

SUNDAY ON THE CANALS.—In the Senate of New York, on the 3d inst., Mr. Field reported against the petitions for closing the canal locks on Sunday. The report was agreed to by a vote of 10 to 8.

REVIVALS IN WESTERN NEW YORK.—The Northern Christian Advocate says that there are numerous revivals now in progress in Western New York. At Union Springs, Brother Orcutt has had a fine work. More than thirty have been converted. In Weedsport and vicinity a revival has been going on for months. The last we heard, a hundred had been converted. Bro. Dunning is still pushing forward for new victories. Last week we attended the preachers' meeting at East Palmyra, or Rochester District; but such was the state of the work on the District, that only a fraction of the preachers were present. They were detained at home by revivals which they could not consistently leave—a blessed hindrance indeed, and by much too uncommon. From various quarters the cheering news comes, up that sinners are turning to God.

A CATHOLIC VIEW OF AMERICA.—A Catholic writer in France furnishes in the Univers the following philosophical explanation of the prevalence of spirit-rapping in the United States:—

"Eminent theologians explain why the devil has more liberty in the United States than in Europe, where the holy sacrifices of the mass are celebrated at vast distances apart, and where so many millions of men, descendants of Protestants, have no religion whatever, and are not even baptized. This rarity of the sacraments leaves the devil greater sway over men; he dares to come nearer the earth, not being driven afar by the frequent immolation of the divine victim, and he enters into communication with the human race by the mysterious means which God leaves open to him."

LECTURES ON THE JEWS.—Mr. J. W. Marcussohn, a converted Israelite, at present a student in Union Theological Seminary, New York, is delivering a course of lectures on Jewish history and customs, in the lecture-room of the church in Mercer-street, New York. The first was given last Sunday evening. Subject, "Rites and Ceremonies of the Jews."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The church and congregation of Stewartsville, N. J., organized with 76 members a little over three years since, have built and paid for their church and grounds about $6000, given several hundred to aid feeble churches, besides regular contributions to the Boards of the Church. During the past year they have erected an ample and convenient parsonage, at a cost of about $1800, of which the balance is expected to be paid by the 1st of April next. About 90 have been added to the membership since the organization.

The Christian Secretary says that Rev. Dr. Turnbull went down to Eagle Mills, in Glastenbury, on Sunday, the 15th of January, and preached in the school-house, in the morning, to a crowded audience. At noon he baptized six converts, who had been previously received on their experience by the First Baptist church in this city. These converts are the fruits of the labors of a few young men, members of the first Baptist church, who have held meetings there for a few months past. Some fifteen or twenty conversions have occurred there since the meetings were commenced.

Judah Touro, a wealthy Jew, recently deceased in New Orleans, left nearly half a million of dollars chiefly to Jewish institutions. Among the bequests we observe one of ten thousand dollars to the city of Newport, R. I., to be applied to the purchase, and improve as a promenade, of the lot on which stands the "old stone mill," which must be familiar to every one who has visited Newport.

The Christian Guardian (Canada) states that a glorious work of revival is progressing in Quebec, under the labors of Rev. James Caughey. Over two hundred persons had professed conversion, and there were abundant tokens of a still more mighty outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

The American Sunday School Union have recently erected a new building at No. 316 Chesnut-street, Philadelphia. This new structure, including the ground and the fitting up of the premises for the business of the society, will cost, when completed, upwards of $65,000, the shelving alone cost $5,000. The voluntary contributions of citizens of Philadelphia toward the building are not far from $13,000.

The new Bible House, which is one of the largest and most imposing edifices in New York, cost $303,000. Yet not one dollar of the Society's regular receipts was used in its erection, and the rents of the various stores and offices will soon clear the building of debt, and then furnish an important addition to the Society's income.

A committee having in charge that subject, announce in the Cincinnati Journal and Messenger, that $50,000 toward the endowment of $125,000 for Granville College is subscribed, and that the subscriptions have therefore become binding.

Hon. Jonathan Phillips has just made a donation of $10,000 to Harvard College, for the increase of the fund for the Greek Professorship. The incumbent of that office, Prof. Felton, is now in Greece, pursuing his studies.

The American Colonization Society has received the past year $82,458, the largest sum ever contributed in one year. Nearly one thousand emigrants have been transported to Africa during the year.

Lady Peel, widow of the late Premier, has gone over to the Church of Rome, with one of her daughters. It is said that both, now on the Continent, intend to take the vail.

A bill is before the Virginia Legislature for the compulsory removal of free blacks now living in that State. There are said to be over fifty thousand of these African freed-men in Virginia.

Rev. Dr. Duff, of Calcutta, the first missionary ever sent to heathen lands by the Church of Scotland in its organized capacity, arrived in this country from Africa, a few days since. He is now in Philadelphia.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce states that on Sunday, 6th of November, the first Chinese church was organized in San Francisco, under the auspices of Rev. W. Speer, of the Chinese Mission.

The Rev. Edward J. Doane was recently ordained a Missionary to the Micronesian Islands, by the Third Presbytery of New York, at the Rev. Dr. Hatfield's Church in Broome-st.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 27.

In the SENATE, petitions against the passage of the Nebraska bill were presented from the States of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, New Hampshire, and New Jersey. Mr. Chase presented petitions from New York and Ohio for a repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law and the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, and the repeal of all laws taking slaves in payment of debts due in the United States. The bills granting lands for the construction of railroads in Louisiana, Wisconsin, Iowa, Alabama, California, Florida, Mississippi and Arkansas, were taken up and passed. After the transaction of some unimportant business, the consideration of the Nebraska bill was resumed, when Mr. Cass made a lengthy speech in favor of the bill. Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, followed in opposition to the bill.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Bocock moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the Senate's bill authorizing the construction of six steam frigates for the Navy, which was disagreed to. The Secretary of the Navy was requested to communicate to the House whether, in his opinion, the steamships employed in the ocean mail service of the United States are of proper construction to be converted into vessels of war in the event of emergency requiring their use for such purposes, and if so, how many and which of them. Other business of no general interest was transacted, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 28.

In the SENATE, several remonstrances were presented against the passage of the Nebraska bill, by Messrs. Toucy, Everett, Fish, Wade, Chase, Sumner and Clayton. A bill was introduced for the relief of purchasers and locators on the overflowed lands in Michigan. The bill granting lands to all the States for the benefit of the indigent insane, was discussed a short time and postponed. The Nebraska bill was then taken up. Mr. Brodhead of Pennsylvania having the floor made a speech in favor of the bill, and Mr. Thompson of New Jersey followed also in favor of the bill.

In the HOUSE, the Committee on Elections reported adversely to the petition contesting the seat of Mike Walsh. The Senate bill granting lands to Wisconsin for the construction of railroads was taken up and debated until the expiration of the morning hour, when the Homestead bill was resumed, the debate on which lasted till the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 1.

In the SENATE, after the presentation of a large number of petitions against the passage of the Nebraska bill, the consideration of the bill granting lands to all the States, for the benefit of the indigent insane, was resumed, debated a short time, and postponed. The Nebraska bill was then taken up, when Mr. Clayton of Delaware proceeded to give his views on the question. He defined his position generally on the subject, and said he would vote for the bill.

The HOUSE, after the disposal of the usual routine business, resumed the consideration of the bill granting a portion of the public lands to Wisconsin for railroad purposes, and debated till the expiration of the morning hour, when the House went into an election for Printer, which resulted in the choice of Mr. Nicholson.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 2.

The SENATE was occupied for the greater portion of the session in listening to the remarks of Messrs. Clayton, Chase, Badger, Cass, Stuart and others on the Nebraska bill. During the morning hour a number of remonstrances against the Nebraska bill were presented. A bill to distribute the public lands among the States was referred.

In the HOUSE, a bill was introduced by Mr. Chamberlain, and referred to the Pacific Railroad Committee, granting the right of way for not more than three railroads across the public lands from commercial points in California and Oregon; and also to grant by donation to actual setters, on condition of occupancy and cultivation for a length of time therein named, every alternate third quarter section of public land for forty miles in width on each side of said railroads, throughout the whole length thereof, and also to grant every alternate section of public land within the aforesaid limits to aid in the construction of said railroads. The House, in Committee, took up the Homestead bill. Some trifling conversation ensued, but no progress was made.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 3.

The SENATE spent the whole day and night upon the Nebraska bill. Among the speakers were Bell of Tenn., Toucy of Conn., Fessenden of Me., Weller of Cal., Houston of Texas, Sumner of Mass., and Douglass of Ill. Finally, at 5 o'clock on Sabbath morning, March 4th, a vote was taken, and the bill passed—ayes 37, noes 14. The Senate then adjourned till Third-day.

In the HOUSE, a message from the President was received, transmitting the report of the Attorney-General, treating of the plan for modifying and enlarging the Judicial system of the United States. Resolutions of the Pennsylvania Legislature, asking for donations of 160 acres of land for soldiers of war of 1812, were presented and referred to Committee on Public Lands. The Homestead bill was then taken up, and various amendments to the bill were discussed, but nothing of especial interest was determined on.

THAT SLAVE-BURNING.—The account we recently printed of the burning of a slave at Union Point, Miss., is pronounced a hoax by the Natchez Free Trader, the paper from which it purported to have been taken. It seems that the story is given in a Narrative of Slave Life by W. Wells Brown, a Fugitive Slave, from whose pages it made its way into The Anti-Slavery Standard, and thence into the other newspapers. The event is represented in the book as having occurred some time since, and the giving it a recent aspect is an error of the journals first copying it from The Standard.

The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad earnings from the 1st to the 11th of February, were $11,904. Last year the receipts for the entire month were $8,930.

European News.

We have European dates to Feb. 15, but nothing definite or important.

No declaration of war has yet taken place, and while preparations are going forward on a great scale, both in France and England, the old story of renewed negotiations and probable peace is again set on foot with as much industry as ever.

Many steamers have been taken up by the British Government to transport troops to Malta and Constantinople; among them are the Niagara and Cambria, belonging to the Cunard line, and hitherto employed between Liverpool and the United States. The fleet sent with these transports to the Mediterranean and the Turkish waters will be the most powerful ever equipped by England. The United French and English armies to be conveyed to Turkey are variously stated at from sixty to a hundred thousand men.

A camp for 40,000 men is being prepared at a place six miles from Constantinople, on the banks of the Sea of Marmora.

From the seat of war on the Danube, the intelligence is not satisfactory. The Russians are steadily investing Kalafat with a large force, and occasional skirmishes take place with various fortune.

Awful Catastrophe at Hartford, Ct.

The steam-boiler in the car-factory of Messrs. Fales & Gray, at Hartford, Ct., exploded at 2 o'clock P. M. on Fifth-day, March 2d, causing the death of about twenty persons, and seriously wounding many others. There were about 300 men employed in the establishment. The explosion shattered the whole of the buildings, and buried some thirty or more persons in the ruins. The brick, mortars, pieces of machinery, beams of wood, and human beings, were blown up to twice the hight of the chimney, or 250 feet, and fell in a shower upon the roofs, completely crushing them, and forcing the standing walls outward. They also fell into the street upon the heads of the people; by which some persons sustained serious injury.

As soon as practicable, or safe, the workmen returned to the rescue of their suffering comrades, whose agonizing groans were painfully loud and frequent. On reëntering the building, it was found that the new boiler, which had been put in about one month before, and been in actual and constant use for three weeks, had exploded; and the fragments into which it was blown resemble shreds of rotten cloth, rather than well tried and annealed boiler iron. The old boiler, which had not been fired up since the new one has been in use, was crushed and bruised out of shape, and its top completely beaten in by the explosion. The blacksmith's shop, a one story building next the boiler room, was completely demolished, and out of twenty men employed in it nine were killed instantly, and nearly all the others severely injured. The front of the freight-car shop was blown in, and a side blacksmith's shop completely demolished.

To paint the agony of relatives, wives, children, mothers and fathers, whose relatives were sufferers, would be impossible. They rushed wildly to and fro, while the workmen were extricating the sufferers, calling upon their relatives in the most piteous tones; and when a body was brought out, the eagerness they manifested to know if it was that of a relative must be imagined, for no words can describe. Suffice it to say, that in many instances they failed to recognize their own relatives, so blackened, and distorted, and mutilated were the bodies by the dirt, bruises and fearful scalds. Some were so badly scalded that on touching them the skin peeled off in the hand. Many of the dead were only recognized by the clothing they wore, and as their relatives sought them out, and found them in the arms of death, the scenes which ensued on recognition were painful in the extreme.

The Case of Dr. Gardiner.

A tragic end to a great crime was achieved by Dr. George A. Gardiner, at Washington, March 3d. Having been convicted of a fraud upon the Government, by which a sum amounting to something near four hundred thousand dollars was obtained from the Mexican indemnity money, he was on that morning sentenced to ten years' hard labor in the Penitentiary. Soon afterward he was found dead in his room, having, as is supposed, taken poison, in order at one blow to escape the disgrace of his offense, and the rigor of its punishment. The case is as remarkable as any recorded in the Causes Celebres. A large sum had been appropriated by Congress, under the treaty of peace with Mexico, to pay off the claims of American citizens, who at various times had suffered injury at the hands of the Mexican authorities. A special Commission, consisting of George Evans of Maine, Caleb B. Smith of Indiana, and Robert Treat Paine of South Carolina, was appointed to examine these claims and decide what was due to the respective claimants. Among them Dr. Gardiner came forward with all sorts of documents, duly signed and sealed, to prove that he had been the owner of a valuable mine in the Department of San Louis Potosi, and that the Mexicans had broken up his mining establishment, causing him a loss of some half million of dollars, more or less. After looking into the papers, and weighing the arguments presented in behalf of Dr. Gardiner, the Commission finally awarded him, if not the whole, a larger sum, as we believe, than was given to any other single claimant. He got the money, paid his counsel a large part of it, and with the rest was a rich man. Soon after this he went to Europe, and while there the suspicion became so strong that his whole claim was a fraud, that an injunction was laid on a considerable portion of the money, which he had left in bank at Washington. He returned and was indicted about three years and a half ago. He was first tried under the indictment about a year since, but that trial resulted in the disagreement of the Jury. The evidence against him was procured by commissions sent to Mexico expressly for the purpose. It was very conclusive; the papers on which his claim had been prosecuted before the indemnity Commissioners were proved to have been for the most part forgeries, and forgeries of a gross character; and it was shown that the mine he claimed to have lost had never had an existence. Still, his case was managed with ability, and the evidence he furnished on the first trial was such as to stagger and divide the Jury on the question of his guilt. We believe, however, that in the interim additional proofs were obtained, which no longer left the possibility of a doubt, and which not only resulted in the verdict rendered, but in the infliction of the law's extremest penalty by the Court. The next stage in the drama was his suicide—a terrible confession of the justice of his sentence, an awful blow to the friends who had stood by him through the prosecution. [Tribune.

THE NEBRASKA BILL PASSED.—By reference to our abstract of proceedings in Congress, it will be seen that the Nebraska Bill passed the Senate on Sabbath morning last, by a vote of 37 to 14. Of those who voted for it, 23 were from the Slave States, and 14 from the Free States Of those who voted against it, all were from the Free States except John Bell of Tennessee, and Samuel Houston of Texas. Nine Senators were absent, of whom it is understood that three were in favor of the bill, and six opposed to it. Had all voted, the vote would have stood 40 to 20.

Of the prospects of the Bill in the House of Representatives, the N. Y. Tribune says:

"But what hope for the House? Bear in mind, that in every struggle between Freedom and Slavery the Senate has always been on the side of Slavery from the start. The House refused to admit Missouri with her Slave Constitution; the Senate went heavily the other way without hesitation, and finally coaxed the House into a Compromise. The House repeatedly passed the Wilmot Proviso; the Senate promptly killed it. The Senate is chosen on the rotten-borough principle, and its Members are far from the People; those of the House represent nearly equal districts, and have a Day of Judgment just before them. We would not encourage delusive hopes, but neither will we counsel despair. A single day will probably tell us whether to exult or mourn over the action of the People's Representatives. But, even if beaten in the House, let us never despair of the cause of Freedom. Nebraska and Kansas are naturally ill-adapted to Slave Labor; but so is Missouri, so are Western Virginia, Eastern Tennessee, and the Mountain region of the Carolinas. These were lost through ignorance or heedlessness, as Nebraska-Kansas must never be. An empire is at stake, and it must never be surrendered while an arm can be raised to defend it. It is to-day Free Soil; it must be kept so by legislation if possible; by resolute exertion, by persevering, all-pervading agitation, if the shield of legality shall be perfidiously wrested from us."

FIRE NEAR HOME.—On Sunday morning, March 5th, a fire broke out in the five-story brick building No. 8 Spruce-st., N. Y., which spread rapidly, and was not subdued until Nos. 8, 10, 12, and 16, were completely ruined, involving the loss of over two hundred thousand dollars. Several periodicals were issued from these buildings, among which were the Independent, American Artisan, Banner of the Union, Ladies' Wreath, and Thompson's Bank Note Reporter. The following list shows the principal losers:—

J. G. Hein, $21,000, insured $14,000; Burdick, Reed & Co., $30,000, insured $12,000; Ira Potter & Co., $3,000; Messrs. Bullock & Co., $2,500; Benedict & Cunningham, $10,000, insured; J. H. SUMMARY.

At the last term of the Superior Court of Connecticut, the report of the Receivers of the Eastern Bank was accepted, and their doings confirmed, by consent of parties interested, and all further action was continued until the April term of the Court. The Killingly Telegraph says: "The effect of this acceptance is to exclude the claims of Messrs. Abernethy & W. E. Chittenden to 1,735 shares of the stock, and to acknowledge the claims allowed by the receivers. We may add, that the prospect now is that all claims of bill holders, depositors and stockholders, which were allowed by the receivers, will ultimately be paid in full."

The Methodist Episcopal Church at Chester Factories, Mass., was blown up on the evening of the 22d ult., by a keg of powder being placed in it and fired by a slow match. The fire was extinguished, but the Church and fixtures are a perfect wreck, the injury being so great that it will be impossible to repair the building. The cause of this outrage probably lies in the fact that a "Carson league" (temperance) recently formed in Chester Factories, had held their meetings in the church.

The Hon. George B. Throop, a prominent citizen of Michigan, died in Detroit recently, from disease of the heart. The deceased had lived in that city for many years, whither he came as President of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Michigan, and was elected a member of the Michigan Legislature for the year 1847. He had formerly been a member of the New York Assembly, and was a brother of Ex-Governor Enos P. Throop, of New York.

The case of Charles Trainer against Rose Cooper, for the abduction of his daughter, Jane Trainer, was brought to trial last week at the Brooklyn Circuit, before Judge Rockwell. The Jury found a verdict in favor of Trainer for a sum which, with the allowance added by the Court, amounted to $850. This is for Trainer's private damages, in having his child taken and kept from him till delivered to him by Judge Barculo.

A dispatch dated Hartford, Saturday, March 4, 1854, says: A woman who gave her name as Harrison, supposed to belong to New Haven, died in this town yesterday from voluntary starvation. She was discovered a few days ago, but steadily refused to take nourishment, and for a long time to give her name. The cause is supposed to be the desertion of her husband. Her age was about forty.

One of the cows exhibited at the late show at Albany was sold for 9c. per lb. live weight, and produced $150 for her owner and breeder, Mr. Henry Hasen of Martinsburgh, Lewis County. This makes her weight 1,666 lbs. P. G. Gardiner, of Schoharie County, lately bought of J. T. Andrus, of West Cornwall, Ct., a buck for $100, and four ewes at $50 each. They are of the New Oxfordshire breed.

The Third Annual Commencement of the Pennsylvania Female Medical College took place at the Musical Fund Hall in Philadelphia, Feb. 25, in presence of a large assemblage. The degree of Doctor of Medicine was conferred on Mrs. Lucinda R. Brown of Galveston, Texas; Miss Elizabeth H. Bates of Morris, Otsego Co., N. Y.; Miss Elizabeth G. Shattuck of Philadelphia, and Miss Minna Elieger of Germany.

It appears from the Albany papers, that there has been an unusual amount of sickness among members of the New York Legislature the present session. Mr. Bostwick of Dutchess has been detained from his seat almost the entire session. Mr. Wart of Oswego is reported to be lying at home dangerously ill. Messrs. Townsend of Cayuga, Wade of Wayne, and White of Madison, are also ill at home.

The Rev. John Berry Meachum, pastor of the First Colored Baptist Church in St. Louis, situated on Eleventh-st., at the head of Green, fell dead in the pulpit on the 19th, directly after reading his text, at 11 o'clock service. He was over sixty years of age, and has been pastor of the congregation of this church, ever since its organization.

A dispatch dated Harrisburg, Pa., Friday, March 3, 1854, says: The House this afternoon considered the prohibitory liquor bill. An amendment striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting a simple submission of the question of prohibition to the people, was lost—Yeas 43, Nays 49. The first section of the bill was then negatived—Yeas 41, Nays 52.

The Rapp Community, residing at Economy, a short distance below Pittsburgh, have remitted $260,000 to New York during the present season, for the purchase of various western railroad securities. This sum was in English sovereigns, which had been hoarded in their vaults since the disastrous times of 1837.

On Sunday night, Feb. 26, during the performance at the French Opera-House in New Orleans, a terrible accident occurred. The gallery fell in, carrying with it the second tier of boxes, killing three persons and wounding fifty others.

DIED.

In Andover, Allegany Co., N. Y., Feb. 6th, 1854, Mrs. ORRILLA REMINGTON, wife of Jerome P. Remington, in the 22d year of her age. The last year of her life was an eventful one indeed. A few days later in February of 1853 than the date of her death, she found the pearl of great price—hope and peace in her Saviour. She at once embraced the Sabbath, offered herself to the Independence Church, and was welcomed to its fellowship. In September following she joined her fortunes with him whom she has left to mourn their early separation. Though her personal acquaintance in the church was very limited at the time of her union with it, during the brief period of her membership, by her consistent life, her affectionate regard for the interests of religion and the fellowship of God's people, and the exercise of a "meek and quiet spirit," she secured a place in the esteem and confidence of all. Her death was a bereavement, not alone of a young and fond husband, with whom she had so recently stepped into the family barque with its prow hopefully pointing out into the sea of life, nor yet of a wide circle of family kindred, who had been interested spectators of the embarkation; but of the whole church, in which she had been an example of Christian grace. A bereavement the more painful to all, as it came so suddenly. Her sickness was of but few hours duration, giving but little time for her survivors to make ready for its mournful termination. Hasty as was the approach of death, claiming her as a victim, she was ready to go. But the sorrow which lingers about her grave is mingled with the sweet hope that her pious example and gentle bearing will still live to be means of blessing and salvation to those by whom her memory will be fondly cherished. T. E. B.

In Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., Feb. 13th, 1854, Mrs. JULIAN MELISSA STILLMAN, wife of Henry Stillman, in the 26th year of her age. She professed religion in early youth, and through her subsequent life and connection with the church of Christ she gave full evidence of a genuine work of grace in her heart. Though in her death her husband and four little children have sustained an irreparable loss, she has doubtless gained possession of an inheritance in that peaceful and happy land, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." T. E. B.

In Greenmanville, Ct, Feb. 20, of consumption, HARRIET P. GREENMAN, daughter of George and Abby Greenman, aged 22 years. Thus in early life has another member of our church exchanged earth for heaven. In all the relations of life, Harriet was a consistent Christian. Cheerful, affectionate, calm and patient in life; trusting in her Saviour, she peacefully and joyfully welcomed her entrance to the spirit world. S. S. G.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 9th of February, 1854, Miss THANKFUL BURDICK, daughter of Hubbard Burdick, deceased, in the 77th year of her age. The subject of this notice was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, and gave good evidence of possessing a well-grounded hope of a blessed immortality.

At Temperance Valley, R. I., Feb. 25th, 1854, Mrs. ELIZABETH KENYON, wife of Samuel P. Kenyon, in the 31st year of her age. She professed religion in early youth, and united with the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, and there remained a member until death. Her sickness was short and severe, but borne with patience and resignation to the divine will. In view of death, her confidence in Christ was unshaken, and her end was peace. C. M. L.

At Lost Creek, Va., Feb. 11th, ELI VANHORN, after an illness of six days. In life he was a pattern of piety and a pillar of the church; in death he gave satisfactory evidence of preparation for the change. His removal is lamented by all.

On the 16th of January, of consumption, Mrs. S. C. GRIGGS, daughter of Mr. Charles Walker, and wife of Mr. S. C. Griggs, of the firm of S. C. Griggs & Co., Chicago, Ill., in the 23d year of her age.

In Brookfield, N. Y., Feb. 12th, LOIS BURCH, widow of the late Nathan Burch, aged 53 years. Mrs. B. was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. During her professional life she pursued an upright and Christian course, and died in hope of eternal life.

In Brookfield, Feb. 24th, JOHN G., son of Daniel and Lydia Langworthy, aged eleven months and eight days.

In Plainfield N. Y., Feb. 20th, MARY AMELIA, daughter of Reed A. and Mary Ann Stiltson, aged three months and ten days.

Near Shiloh, N. J., Jan. 26th, STANLEY V., infant son of Charles C. and Sarah S. Socwell, aged 5 months and 18 days.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

For the rapid Cure of Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Bronchitis, Whooping-Cough, Croup, Asthma, and Consumption.

THIS remedy is offered to the community with the confidence we feel in an article which seldom fails to realize the happiest effects that can be desired. So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind, is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, which are incident to our climate.

Nothing has called louder for the earnest inquiry of medical men, than the alarming prevalence and fatality of consumptive complaints, nor has any one class of diseases had more of their investigation and care. But as yet no adequate remedy had been provided, on which the public could depend for protection from attacks upon the respiratory organs, until the introduction of the CHERRY PECTORAL. This article is the product of a long, laborious, and I believe successful endeavor, to furnish the community with such a remedy. Of this last statement the American people are now themselves prepared to judge, and I appeal with confidence to their decision. If there is any dependence to be placed in what men of every class and station certify it has done for them, if we can trust our own senses, when we see dangerous affections of the throat and lungs yield to it, if we can depend on the assurance of intelligent Physicians, who make it their business to know—in short, if there is any reliance upon anything, then it is irrefutably proven that this medicine does relieve and does cure the class of diseases it is designed for, beyond any and all others that are known to mankind. If this be true, it cannot be too freely published, nor be too widely known. The afflicted should know it. A remedy that cures, is priceless to them. Parents should know it, their children are priceless to them. All should know it, for health can be priced to no one. Not only should it be circulated here, but everywhere, not only in this country, but in all countries. How faithfully we have acted on this conviction, is shown in the fact that already this article has made the circle of the globe. The sun never sets on its limits. No continent is without it, and but few peoples. Although not in so general use in other nations as in this, it is employed by the more intelligent in almost all civilized countries. It is extensively employed in both Americas—in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the far off islands of the sea. Life is as dear to its possessors there as here, and they grasp at a valuable remedy with even more avidity. Unlike most preparations of its kind, it is an expensive composition of costly material. Still it is afforded to the public at a reasonably low price, and what is of vastly more importance to them, its quality is never suffered to decline from its original standard of excellence. Every bottle of this medicine, now manufactured, is as good as ever has been made heretofore, or as we are capable of making. No toil or cost is spared, in maintaining it in the best perfection which it is possible to produce. Hence the patient who procures the genuine CHERRY PECTORAL, can rely on having as good an article as has ever been had by those who testify to its cures.

By pursuing this course, I have the hope of doing some good in the world, as well as the satisfaction of believing that much has been done already.

The Expedition to Central Africa.

The following letter has been addressed by Mr. Augustus Petermann to the editor of the London Daily News:—

"Fourteen months since, I laid before the public a communication respecting the progress of the African Expedition, and particularly the important discovery of Dr. Barth of a magnificent river in the far interior, forming the upper course of the Chadda, a tributary to but larger than the Kowara, (commonly called Niger,) and flowing through the extensive kingdom of Adamaua, the most fertile and beautiful of all the countries of Central Africa visited by Dr. Barth. Five months since, it was announced in the public papers, that an expedition up that river, by means of a steamboat, had been decided on by Her Majesty's Government; and a few weeks since Mr. Macgregor Laird, the contractor for building the vessel, in a communication to the Royal Geographical Society, announced that the vessel would be ready next month. The plan of the expedition is, to arrive at the mouth of the Kowara before the 1st of July, and to steam at once up the river with the rising waters. It is estimated that the kingdom of Adamaua may be reached within three or four weeks after leaving the Bight of Benin. It is the opinion of the most competent persons that if any thing will open the vast interior of Africa to European commerce and civilization, it will be the magnificent river discovered by Dr. Barth; and the British public will therefore, doubtless, look forward with anxiety to the present attempt to ascend the river leading to those important and promising regions. Accounts of the progress of this expedition have been promptly and regularly laid before the public; and the Earl of Clarendon, in order to give to the world the benefit of this information as early as possible, has kindly sanctioned, at my particular solicitation, the immediate publication of some most important maps, with descriptive letter press relating thereto. In connection with this publication, which will be ready in the course of a few weeks, I have been kindly allowed to make extracts from Dr. Barth's official communication containing the details of the said discovery, of which the following, as being particularly interesting with respect to the Chadda expedition, I am anxious to make at once known to the public, and would ask of you kindly to afford the space for that purpose. 'It will be remembered, that Dr. Barth, after a twelve months' journey through the great desert, under severe hardships, and trials, was the first of the three travelers to arrive at Lake Tsad. Owing to the melancholy death of Mr. Richardson, the leader of the expedition, he found the whole undertaking in a state of complete disorganization. Yet such was his indomitable energy and courage, that he borrowed a sum of money from the Vizier of Bornu, and determined to penetrate to the south alone, in order to reach Adamaua, which country had been reported to him as the most beautiful of Central Africa. On the 29th of May, 1851, accordingly, he left Kuka, and after a fortnight's march through the dominions of Bornu as well as those of independent pagan nations—at a distance from Kuka of 155 geographical miles in a straight line—he reached Uba, the northernmost place of Adamaua, situated exactly in the same latitude as the celebrated Mount Mindif, seen by Major Denham, namely, in 10 deg. 20 min. north latitude and 35 geographical miles west from it. 'From this place,' says Dr. Barth, 'all the country to the south was covered with the most splendid herbage and enlivened with numerous herds of cattle belonging to the Fellatas. The atmosphere was now cool and refreshing, the sky covered with clouds during the greater part of the day, and thunder-storms occurred almost every day. The country wore altogether a rich and beautiful appearance; the huts of the inhabitants are built with more solidity than in the northern region of Sudân, as the rainy season lasts seven months in Adamaua. The population of the country is considerable, large towns being met with at every three or four hours, with villages between, exclusively inhabited by the slaves of the ruling Fellatas. The slaves do all the work, and every Fellata, down to the very poorest, possesses at least from two to four slaves. Indeed, in no country of the world is slavery carried on to such a degree as in Adamaua, where slaves, in addition to cattle, are considered as the foundation of the wealth of the people. The chiefs of the country have countless multitudes of these poor creatures. There are few slaves, however, exported from Adamaua except those of the Dama tribe east of Yola, the capital of the kingdom, as they do not find a ready sale in the Sudan markets on account of their great mortality when taken away from their mountainous country. Nevertheless, they form, with ivory, the chief articles of commerce. Ivory is extremely cheap in Anamaua on account of the great number of elephant. In Baya, twelve days' journey south of Yola, the elephants are found in still greater numbers. The chief articles of import are turkedies, tobes, glass, pearls, and salt. Cowries have no value in this country, the current medium of barter consisting of narrow stripes of coarse cotton called gébbega. Saraw, distant 52 miles from Uba, is the chief town of the northern part of Adamaua, and is a considerable market place. Previously to reaching Saraw, we passed a place called Mbutúdi, surrounded with beautiful scenery, where the gigina, a peculiar species of palm tree, appears. The people of this tract had never seen a Christian before my visit, and received me with the utmost kindness and hospitality, taking me altogether for a superior being. The most important day, however, in all my African journeys, was the 18th of June, when we reached the river Benué, at a point called Taëpe, where it is joined by the river Faro. [In latitude 9 degs. 2 min. north, and longitude 14 degs. east from Greenwich.] Since leaving Europe, I had not seen so large, and imposing a river. The Benué, or 'mother of waters,' which is by far the larger one of the two, is half a mile broad, and 9½ feet deep in the channel where we crossed it. On our return, eleven days later, it had risen 1½ feet. The Faro is 5-12ths of a mile broad, and was 3 feet deep, which had increased to 7¼ feet by our return. Both rivers have a very strong current, and run to the west into the Kowara. We crossed the Benué in boats made out of single trees 25 to 35 feet long and 1 to 1½ feet broad, and forded the Faro, which latter was accomplished not without difficulty, on account of the strong current. The Benué is said to rise nine days' journey from Yola in a south easterly direction, and the Faro seven days' journey distant, in a rock called Labul. During the rainy season the country is inundated to a great extent by the two rivers, which rise to their highest level toward the end of July, and remain at that level for forty days, viz. till the first days of September, when the waters begin to fall. Both rivers are full of crocodiles, and the Benué, I was told, contained gold. After having crossed the rivers, with some difficulty to the camels, we passed at first through some swampy ground, then through a very fine country thickly inhabited, and reached Yola, the capital, on the 22d of June.' In another communication of Dr. Barth he states, that the river Benué rises during the rainy season to a hight of 40 to 50 feet. The discovery of Dr. Barth is unquestionably the most important which has been made in Africa for a very long time; and so striking did the superior advantages of the river he discovered appear to Her Majesty's Government, that a proposed ascent up the Kowara, to reach Timbuktu and the desert countries, was rejected, and the ascent up the Chadda Benué was decided on. Indeed, if the hopes of those most able to judge be realized, those virgin countries, with their innumerable herds of cattle, and other agricultural treasures, with their abundance of ivory, blessed with a climate which seems so salubrious, that the inhabitants, when brought to the more unhealthy regions further west along the Kowara, die off like sheep—those fertile, cultivated, and densely peopled countries of Inner Africa will be brought to within a few weeks' sail of the docks of London. There is no desert to be passed, as in Northern and Southern Africa, which have been, and ever will be, the natural barriers, to commerce and civilization.

Rubber Shoes.

The New York Journal of Commerce, in an interesting article on the manufactures of Connecticut, gives the following account of the manner in which India Rubber shoes are made:—

"Contrary to the general impression, India Rubber, in the process of manufacturing, is not melted, but is passed through heated iron rollers, the heaviest of which weighs twenty tons, and thus worked or kneaded, as dough is at a bakery. The rubber is nearly all procured from the mouth of the Amazon, in Brazil, to which point it is sent from the interior. Its form, on arrival, is generally that of a jug or pouch, as the natives use clay moulds of that shape, which they repeatedly dip into the liquid caoutchuac, until a coating of the desired thickness accumulates, when the clay is broken and emptied out.

"The rubber, after being washed, chopped fine, and rolled to a putty-like consistency, is mixed with a compound of metallic substances, principally white lead and sulphur, to give it body and firmness. Those sheets designed for the soles of shoes are passed under rollers having a diamond figured surface. From these the soles are cut by hand, and several pieces required to perfect the shoe are put together by females, on a last. The natural adhesion of the rubber joins the seams. The shoes are next varnished and baked in an oven capable of holding about 2,000 pairs, and heated to about 300 degrees, where they remain seven or eight hours. This is called the 'vulcanizing' process, by which the rubber is hardened.

"A large quantity of cotton cloth and cotton flannel is used to line shoes, and is applied to the surface of the rubber while it is yet in sheets. Not a particle of any of these materials is lost. The scraps of rubber are remelted, and the bits of cloth are chopped up with a small quantity of rubber, and rolled out into a substance resembling pasteboard, to form the inner sole. The profits of this business have been somewhat curtailed of late, by the high price of rubber, which has varied within a year from twenty to sixty cents per pound. The demand, however, is very large. A species of rubber shoes lined with flannel is extensively used in some parts of the country as a substitute for the leathern shoe."

Rearing Calves.

Herdsmen and others, (says the N. E. Farmer,) who have some experience in raising young cattle, have expressed various opinions in relation to the most proper course or mode of treatment to be pursued, some contending, with a good deal of stringency, for the natural way, as they term it—i. e., permitting them to enjoy the company of their dams till four, five, six or ten months of age, while others assert, with equal pertinacity, that the better way is to separate them from the cows when a few days old, and raise them by "hand." Whether the one or other is the most expensive, will depend wholly, or in a great measure, upon the circumstances of time and place. In very many localities, the butter and cheese a judicious and economical dairyman would be able to realize from the milk, or from the milk itself, without manufacturing it, would be worth more in ready cash than the carcase of the calf, while in others it would scarcely defray in the market the cost of manufacturing, while the calf would be valuable. A friend who has had much experience in dairying and rearing calves, has directed attention to the following able article on the subject in the Genesee Farmer. We present it from that sheet as conveying a most lucid and readily understandable synopsis of our own views of what, in a large majority of cases, would unquestionably be found the most judicious and economical course, for the farmer engaged in stock raising for the market, to pursue:

"The cost in both cases ought to be taken into consideration. In the first instance, the butter and cheese which might be made from the milk would amount to more in four months than the value of the calf at that age. In the latter, the proceeds of the milk are nearly attained, independent of raising the calf. This can be established by unquestionable authority. Then there is a very great balance in favor of the latter.

"That the calf that runs with the cow four months will somewhat exceed in growth and proportion the one reared by hand, is readily granted. But after that period it is taken from the cow, and has to graze to get its own living. Then a change of diet takes place; it shortly becomes stunted; its growth is checked, and this too at the very period when it ought to be in the most thriving condition. The one reared by hand becomes more and more accustomed to food, continues gradually to improve, without receiving any check in its growth, and when winter arrives, is in far better condition than the others.

"There are different procedures in preparing the mess for the calf. Each one has a favorite plan. One mixes with a small portion of milk, a portion of boiled potatoes and fine bran. Another boils the milk, and lets it stand till it cools to the temperature of milk from the cow. The plan most generally adopted (and perhaps the best) is, to let the milk stand twelve hours, at first, when it is skimmed, heated to the temperature of the cow, and a handful of shorts and flour added to each calf's mess. Four or five quarts of milk is at first a proper quantity. This is to be gradually increased as judgment can best decide. After four or five weeks, whey, with a small quantity of shorts added, can be taken with equal success. Calves raised in this manner are more gentle and docile than when they run with the cows, and can be better managed through the winter, and most generally afterwards. Another very important consideration is, they soon forget their mother, and the trouble of keeping them separate through the fall and winter is dispensed with."

Jefferson on Slavery.

From Notes on the State of Virginia, p. 236.

There must doubtless be an unhappy influence on the manners of our people, produced by the existence of Slavery among us. The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitting despotism on one part, and degrading submission on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it, for man is an imitative animal. This quality is the germ of all education in him. From his cradle to his grave he is learning to do what he sees others do. If a parent could find no motive, either in his philanthrophy or his self-love, for restraining the intemperance of passion toward his slave, it should always be a sufficient one that his child is present. But generally it is not sufficient. The parent storms, the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, gives a loose rein to his worst passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals undepraved by such circumstances. And with what execration should the statesman be loaded, who, permitting one half of the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despots, and these into enemies, destroys the morals of the one part, and the amor patria of the other. For if a slave can have a country in this world, it must be any other in preference to that in which he is born to live and labor for another; in which he must lock up the faculties of his nature, contribute as far as he depends on his individual endeavors to the evanisment of the human race, or entail his own miserable condition on the endless generations proceeding from him. With the morals of the people, their industry also is destroyed. For in a warm climate, no man will labor for himself who can make another labor for him. This is so true, that of the proprietors of slaves, a very small proportion indeed are ever seen to labor. And can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are of the gift of God? That they are not to be violated but with his wrath? INDEED, I TREMBLE FOR MY COUNTRY WHEN I REFLECT THAT GOD IS JUST; THAT HIS JUSTICE CANNOT SLEEP FOREVER; that, considering numbers, nature and natural means only, a revolution of the wheel of fortune, an exchange of situation is among possible events; that it may become probable by supernatural interference. THE ALMIGHTY HAS NO ATTRIBUTE WHICH CAN TAKE SIDES WITH US IN SUCH A CONTEST.

Railroad Brakes.

Mr. Wm. G. Creamer, of New York, has invented an excellent method of stopping railroad cars in case of danger, for which a patent was taken out in December last. It is done by means of the ordinary brakes which are made to operate instantaneously either by the brakeman or by the engineer. A stout brass spring is coiled like the main-spring of a watch, and connected to the ordinary brake-wheel at pleasure. This spring is capable of sufficient power to operate the brake completely and instantaneously. The spring is wound up by the brakeman at his leisure, by giving a reciprocating movement to the brake wheel, which acts on a ratchet-wheel, without interfering with the ordinary use of the brake. The power thus accumulated in the spring is ready for use at any moment, and is operated by simply starting a catch. What gives this invention its principal value is the fact that all the brakes of a whole train of moderate length may be by this means "put on" by the engineer without leaving his place. A cord passes up from the catch or trigger—which is near the platform of the car—and is united to the usual signal bell rope of the train, the point of such union being some yards forward, to allow the working of the bell rope. This branch cord is attached to the trigger in such manner that it slips off immediately when the spring is discharged, and thus the engineer is enabled, by pulling the bell-rope from his end, to operate all the brakes in a long train. Should a spring be accidentally applied at an improper time, the brakeman—who is not necessarily as vigilant or as much exposed to the weather as at present—has merely to exert himself for a few seconds in winding it up and again establishing the proper connection with the engineer. The inventor proposes to dispense with none of the brakeman now employed, making it the duty of each to work the brakes as usual on all ordinary occasions. The invention is simply an additional precaution, and certainly promises an important safeguard against the fearful accidents continually attending on our present railroad arrangements.

MASSACHUSETTS SHOE TRADE.—It is stated that the aggregate value of boots and shoes manufactured in Massachusetts is $37,000,000, or more than that of all the other States combined, and far exceeding that of any other manufacture in the Commonwealth. Lynn is more extensively engaged in this business than any other town, making nearly five million pairs annually. Then come in succession, Danvers, Stoneham, and Grafton. In the latter town a single manufacturer uses one hundred bushels of shoe pegs every year. The pegs used in this immense business are for the most part made in New Hampshire; they are cut by machinery, and one firm manufactures fifty bushels a day. Machinery is also now used to a considerable extent for sewing and stitching the leather.

IMPROVEMENTS IN HOES.—Some of the best of the premium hoes exhibited at the Crystal Palace are made by L. Bolles & Co., at Oxford, N. Y., by a newly organized manufacturing company. These hoes are all hammered out of solid bars of cast steel. A piece of a bar 3 inches wide and ⅝ of an inch thick is cut off at a given length, say six inches, for a particular numbered hoe, the first process with which is to heat and draw out the center under repeated strokes of the trip hammer, to the proper length of the shanks for two hoes. Then the steel is passed to another workman, who draws out the blades. This is termed rough hammering. Then they are passed to a smooth hammer, and finished hammering, when they are ground and polished, the shanks being finished and turned by hand all to an exact pattern. The machinery is driven by steam, and they manufacture about 300 to 400 hoes per day, of a quality perhaps unsurpassed by anything of the kind ever before offered to the farmers of the country, though there are now many similar establishments, all of which afford hoes of this excellent description at less prices than we used to pay for the old clumsy, home-made iron thing which gave us many a back ache and blistered hand.

INTRODUCTION OF THE POTATO INTO NEW ENGLAND.—In a recent article upon the early manufactures of New England, we mentioned that the Scotch immigrants were the first to introduce the manufacture of linen in the colonies. These frugal and industrious persons were descendents of a Scotch colony who settled in Ireland about the middle of the seventeenth century, but on account of religious persecution were obliged to flee to this country, where they arrived in 1718. They came over in five ships, and landed in Boston, having previously sent over an agent to make arrangements.

They introduced the culture of the potatoe, which they brought with them from Ireland. Until their arrival, this valuable, if not wholly unknown plant was not cultivated in New England. They passed the previous winter in Andover, before settling in Londonderry, and there left some potatoes, which were planted and came up luxuriantly. The family who raised them cooked the balls, instead of the vegetable; and, after trying them in various ways, pronounced them unfit for use, and the mistake was not discovered until the plow turned up the real potatoe.

THE ABORIGINES.—The whole number of Indians within the limits of the United States is estimated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to be 400,000. About 18,000 yet remain in the States east of the Mississippi, principally in New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin; the remainder, consisting of Cherokees, Choctaws and Seminoles, being in North Carolina, Mississippi, and Florida. The number in Minnesota, and along the frontiers of the Western states of Texas, being mostly emigrated tribes, is estimated at 110,000; those on the plains and Rocky mountains, not within any organized territory, at 63,000; those in Texas, at 29,000; in New Mexico, at 45,000; in California, at 100,000; in Utah, at 12,000; in Oregon and Washington territories, at 23,000. The whole amount to be expended on account of the Indian service the present year, is $1,015,735; of which $532,907 is for money annuities, $136,676 for goods and provisions, $61,962 for education $94,319 for agricultural and mechanical assistance, and $189,870 for miscellaneous purposes for the benefit of the Indians.

PERILOUS OPERATION ON A LION.—An occurrence of a singular nature happened one Monday night, at Wombwell's menagerie, Castle Terrace, Edinburgh. During the feeding of the animals the lion Wallace was seen to rush wildly to and fro in his den, and on closer observation it was ascertained that a large bone, which he had been attempting to swallow, had stuck crossways in his throat, almost suffocating him. Two of the keepers instantly entered the cage. One of them had a pitchfork, the handle of which he got into the animals mouth, after which he courageously thrust his arm down the lion's throat, and succeeded in displacing the bone with his hand. Considerable excitement prevailed at the time among the visitors and others, great anxiety being also felt for the safety of the intrepid keepers. The lion soon recovered.

CURIOSITIES OF TRADE.—Among the importations into this country, is a certain class of articles, embracing an almost endless variety, which are called the non-enumerated. Some of them cost a mere trifle and are little used; others, equally cheap, are of such general use that their aggregate is considerable. Few persons know that these articles enter into commercial transactions. During the year ending June 30th, 1853, the value of slate pencils entered at the New York Custom House, was $3733; of sausage skins, $224; little night tapers, $267; tooth-picks, $341; bladders, $1257; orange peel, $581; peach kernels, $8; goose skins, $766; rose leaves, $773; skeletons, $351; sand, $3; goose liver oil, $131; spunk, $14; making an aggregate of $7,449. This list of incongruous articles could be enlarged to a great extent.

STRONG DRINK A LEVELER.—Not long since, there were taken to the Tombs in New York, while in beastly intoxication, a lawyer who had been somewhat distinguished in his profession—a historian, the author of a standard work—an editor, once talented and of great respectability—and lastly, a clergyman, a man of refined manners and highly educated. The lawyer was let off the next morning, on promise of better behavior; the historian succeeded in getting his liberty, to get drunk again the morning following; the editor was sent to the almshouse; and the clergyman, at the date of our information, still remained in durance. What an example this of the leveling power of strong drink!

CHARCOAL FOR SWINE.—It is not perhaps generally known that one of the best articles that can be given to swine, while in preparation for the tub, is common charcoal. The nutritive properties are so great that they have subsisted on it without other food for weeks together. Geese confined so as to deprive them of motion and fattened on three grains of corn per day, and as much coal as they can devour, have become fattened in eight days. The hog eats charcoal voraciously after a little time, and is never sick while he has a good supply. It should always be kept in the sty and be fed to the inmates regularly like any other food.

THE RAINING TREE.—In the midst of the island of Fierro, one of the most considerable of the Canaries, there is a raining tree which is the only one of the kind. The leaves of it are long and narrow, and continue in a constant verdure, winter and summer; and its branches are covered with a cloud, which is never dispelled, but resolved into a moisture, which causes to fall from its leaves a very clear water, and that in such abundance that the cisterns, which are placed at the foot of the tree to receive it are never empty, but contain enough to supply both man and beast.

VARIETY.

In a recent sitting of the Societe d' Encouragement pour 'l Industrie Nationale, the process of reproducing photographs by means of lithographs was thus described: An ordinary lithographic stone is taken, and a solution of Citume de Judee (Jews' pitch) is placed on it. A negative photographic proof is then put on it and is pressed upon the stone for a period which may vary from ten minutes to four or five hours. The stone is then washed with pure ether. The figure is found properly marked with its lights and shades, and it may be inked and printed from as an ordinary lithograph.

A correspondent of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal says:—"The more I reflect upon the mysteries of neurology and animal chemistry, the more confident I am that, while we are the least suspecting it, trifling errors in our daily life are producing important effects upon our corporeal systems; and I declare it as my deliberate conviction, that the habit, which may almost be styled American, of using the razor upon the face, is sufficient to cause a large proportion of the lamentable evils which affect the human race in this country."

The Fredericksburg News says: In the country in which we were raised, for twenty generations back, a certain family of wealth and respectability have intermarried, until there cannot be found in three of them a sound man or woman. One has sore eyes, another scrofula, a third is idiotic, a fourth blind, a fifth bandy-legged, a sixth with a head about the size of a turnip, with not one out of the number exempt from physical or mental defects of some kind.

The London Times once sent out a traveling editor to investigate the subject of city-sewerage. He traveled three years without perpetrating a single article; but shortly after that, the subject came up before Parliament, and the Times astonished the world with twenty leaders on the subject, proving that they were better informed on the subject than all England beside.

It may not be generally known that the human hair, [light hair,] held up to the sun, presents all the phenomena of the prism, giving the various colors of the rainbow. Insolated hairs will give at their end the circle, colored as the rainbow. The hair, therefore, is proved to be triangular, and possessing the properties of the prism.

In Syracuse, N. Y., during the past year, 5,464,453 bushels of salt were manufactured—about four-fifths of which was fine salt. During 1853, 92,491 bushels of Onondaga salt reached tide water, 1,055,723 were received at Buffalo, 2,724,264 at Oswego, and 14,685 bushels at Whitehall.

Henry Ward Beecher tells of a pear tree in Illinois, about ten miles from Vincennes, Ind., that bore 184 bushels of pears in 1834, and 140 bushels in 1840, of large sized pears. One foot above the ground it girths ten feet, and nine feet above, six and a half feet, and its branches spread over a space sixty-nine feet wide. It is said to be about fifty years old.

There are now upward of 40 newspapers published in New Hampshire: 6 are published in Rockingham County, 4 in Strafford, 2 in Belknap; 7 in Merrimack, 13 in Hillsborough, 3 in Cheshire, 3 in Sullivan, 2 in Crafton, 1 in Coös, none in Carrol. Politically, 11 are Democratic, 9 are Whig, 5 are Free-Soil, 3 are religious, 2 are Temperance, 1 is agricultural, and ten are miscellaneous.

Gavazzi, in one of his lectures upon Popery, says that the church of Rome has slaughtered for religious opinion in three centuries, 327,000 victims in Spain, 48,000 Huguenots in France, 100,000 Waldenses, and all the victims of the bloody Mary of England, and James the sixth of Scotland.

In a lecture on China, delivered at Bolton, Eng., Dr. Bowring said it had been calculated that if all the bricks, stones, and masonry of Great Britain were gathered together, they would not furnish materials enough for a work such as the Wall of China; and that all the buildings in London put together would not have made the towers and turrets which adorn it.

One of the largest diamonds known has been deposited at the Bank of England by a London house, to whom it was consigned from Rio Janeiro. Its weight is 254 carats, and its estimated value according to the scale £280,000. It is said to be of the finest water, and without flaw, and was found by a negro slave, who received his freedom as a reward.

A Frenchman has invented a bake-oven heated by means of hot air; this oven admits 14 charges of bread in 24 hours, and 2,000 lbs. bread cost only 50 cents to be baked, whereas in the ordinary ovens the same quantity costs from 60 to 80 cents; the price of such an oven amounts to about $600.

The amount of the stock and securities in the English chancery is about £46,000,000; the annual payments in and out of court, £250,000; the amount of suitors' cash in court, including the balance, £2,500,000. The "Surplus Cash Fund," or "Accumulation Fund," is said to amount to £1,241,188 stock.

The Superintendent of the Banking Department has given notice that the circulating notes of the Patchin Bank of Buffalo must be presented at his office for redemption within two years from the 20th Feb., when the securities deposited with the Department will be given up to the Bank.

Mr. W. S. G. Mason, of West Townsend, Sandusky County, says that he has three pullets, of the Cochin China breed, that recently laid eight eggs in two days, and two of the eggs were double yolked. He very naturally asks, "Who can beat that?" And we very naturally ask, Can this be true?

The substance of the verdict of a recent coroner's jury on a man who died in a state of inebriation, was: 'Death by hanging—round a rumshop.' There are many such.

THE LAND OF THE PHILISTINES.

From a series of letters, written by Rev. J. P. Thompson, and published in The Independent, we copy the following description of a region full of interest to every reader of the Scriptures.

We had not time to explore minutely the supposed site of the ancient Gaza; but a cursory examination satisfied us that what was once a powerful and opulent city of the Philistines upon the seacoast, a city that had long withstood the extension of the tribes of Israel towards the southwest, that had sustained memorable sieges from Egyptian and Persian kings and both Macedonian and Jewish Alexanders, has utterly perished, so that all traces of it were lost except occasional fragments of marble and of fused brick under a huge mound of sand. "Baldness is come upon Gaza," it is "forsaken," a "fire has devoured the palaces thereof," and "the king has perished from it." (Jer. 47: 5, Amos 1: 6, Zeph. 9: 5.)

The modern city, about three miles from the site of the ancient, is not upon the sea, and is a place of little trade in comparison with its predecessor. Still, there were signs of industry in the bazaar, and as the outport of Syria toward Egypt, Gaza still profits by the caravan commerce between the two countries. It is better built than most Egyptian towns, because here stone is more abundant than in Egypt, and this material gives to buildings a more substantial appearance than the crude brick there in common use. The people also look better than the common people in Egypt. Still the narrow, crooked streets, heaped up with the accumulation of filth, and the intermingling of men and cattle in the same abodes, carried back my thoughts continually to the land of darkness. A few fragments of the old city have been transferred to the new, but for the most part the Gaza that now is has no affinity with the Gaza that has perished.

I now began to feel that I was really upon Bible ground. Here was the scene of some of Samson's memorable achievements, and not far from this was the "desert" way in which Phillip overtook the Ethiopian treasurer and expounded to him the scriptures and baptized him in the name of Christ. On every hand the scenes of the Bible were illustrated, and its reference to local customs explained—for here the manners and customs of the people are as permanent as the natural features of the country. The oxen were "treading out grain," by stamping upon huge piles laid on the smooth hard surface of the ground; the bells of the horses and camels were tinkling as caravans passed by, and awakened the hope of that day when holiness to the Lord shall be inscribed upon all the property, the commerce and the enterprise of man. Flocks of sheep and goats, promiscuously intermingled, suggested the occasion of the Saviour's allusion to the separation of the two in the last day. Our dragoman plucked ears of grain as we rode in the open fields of wheat, and rubbing them between his hands ate the fresh kernels with as much relish as did the hungry disciples of Christ. He stopped repeatedly to salute old friends, and the delay occasioned by the oriental ceremonial explained the command of Elisha to Gehazi not to exchange salutations with any upon the way, when he would have him go in haste to the Shunamite woman. Wells and reservoirs by the wayside, constructed as a public charity, or guarded as private property, at which camels and cattle were drinking, recalled the days of the patriarchs, when a well was the choicest of treasures. The distant slopes of Judah, as well as the undulating lands of Simeon, were covered with "the cattle on a thousand hills"—immense herds feeding on the tender herbage among the rocks, or on the stubble of the newly-reaped fields of barley. The dwellers in tents were journeying inland for the sake of employment during the harvest. whole families trudging after a single camel or an ass that bore on its back their entire furniture.

The country around Gaza, and indeed throughout nearly the whole of the ancient Philistia, confirms the testimony of the Bible in two opposite respects. The soil is naturally good and fertile, and capable of great productiveness under proper cultivation; "a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegrantes; a land of olive-trees and honey [all which productions are still characteristic of the region;] a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness." All this was evidently true. In this part of the land the soil was originally rich and easy to cultivate. But on the other hand it is now comparatively a waste and a desolation. It has been exhausted and neglected till it no longer teems with plenty as it once did—thus confirming the predictions of the prophets. In some sections, however, there are signs of improved cultivation. In the neighborhood of Gaza are immense groves of olive trees, said to be the most extensive in Palestine. They cover an area of many miles, and besides their great value for fruit and oil, they give a charming appearance to the country and a welcome shade to the traveler. The olive is said to live for 1,000 years and upwards; and some of those trees bore the marks of very great age. The tobacco-plant flourishes here and is extensively cultivated; also cucumbers, onions, and melons of all sorts, which form a principal item in the diet of the natives. The prickly pear, which resembles an overgrown cactus, is commonly used for fences, and is valuable also for its fruit and as fuel. The crops of grain are light, for want of proper tillage.

Our route lay through the ancient territory of the Philistines, once divided into five principalities, with their several capitals, Gaza, Gath, Askelon, Ashdod and Ekron. This territory lay along the sea-coast, and is the highway of caravan commerce from Egypt to Damascus and the East. These cities were wealthy and powerful, well-fortified and populous. Agriculture and the mechanic arts flourished in Philistia, and gave the inhabitants of this region an ascendancy over the Israelites (1 Sam. 13: 19.) The territory here allotted to Simeon and Dan was not subdued by Joshua, and though from time to time conquered by the Jews, it does not seem to have been permanently held by them until about one hundred years before Christ, after it had been subdued by Alexander the Great. Indeed, the Philistines seem to have remained as a scourge to Israel, a thorn in their side, to rebuke them for their frequent lapses into idolatry. Yet judgments were pronounced against Philistia which have been literally fulfilled.

A ride of about four hours brought us to the site of Askelon. All along the coast from Gaza, were immense accumulations of sand, evidently heaped upon a better soil, and giving to the whole sea-board an aspect of utter desolation. These mounds or drifts of the finest sand of the desert, sometimes extended inland for a space of from two to five miles, while the adjacent soil, once evidently fertile, is now used merely for the pasturage of roving flocks of sheep. The sword of the Lord had a special charge "against the sea-shore" (Jer. 47: 7,) which is most strikingly fulfilled. "The sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds and folds for flocks," (Zephaniah 2: 16.) "Askelon shall be a desolation; it shall not be inhabited." (Zephaniah 2: 4 and Zechariah 9: 5.)

I was surprised to find at Askelon such extensive ruins. They lie chiefly on and under an immense mound of sand that sweeps back from the coast in a semicircle for more than a mile; and they consist mainly of fragments of walls and towers, arches, banches, reservoirs, and columns of marble and granite, strewn thickly around or half buried under the sand. The principal one is that of a fort, (probably Roman) whose walls, six feet thick, are in part standing, and in part broken into huge masses of stone and cement. The ruins of a small church, adorned with columns of marble and of granite, were discovered here a few years since, when excavations were made for a work of Ibraham Pasha in the neighborhood. The form of the building may still be distinctly traced, though it has been robbed of its most valuable materials. Some of the granite columns lying on the surface are of fine texture and excellent finish.

The site of the city was well chosen. It stood upon a bluff, or rather covered two projecting bluffs that guard a circling cove, and that formed the ancient harbor. It stretched along a chord of more than a mile with a radius inland of at least half a mile, and commanded a splendid view of the Mediterranean. The bluffs at the sea-side vary from 30 to 60 feet in height, and were walled up and faced with buildings from bottom to top. There is now a beautiful beach at their base. Several large reservoirs, sunk in the rock and arched with solid masonary, remain to testify the value put by the inhabitants upon cool water in the hot season. Most of these were fed from neighboring wells and tanks, which are now used to irrigate the gardens of figs, olives, and grapes, that have been planted amid the ruins of the ancient city. But though the ruined city is made in part a vineyard, it is still desolate and without inhabitants; for the present cultivation is carried on by the inhabitants of a little village half a mile distant, which does not even pretend to the ancient name.

Traces of a wall at some distance beyond the principal ruins show that the city was more extensive even than these would indicate, and was well ordered for defense.

About four hours more brought us to Esdad, where are the ruins of an old building about 200 feet in length, with thick walls and massive arches. This marks the site of the ancient Ashdod. The road to this point from Askelon turns inland to the north-east. The same huge mounds of sand marked the coast; but the country, as it spread inland, looked quite rich and was well covered with barley-fields—now in harvest—and with flocks and herds. In some places the fresh grain was seen springing under the very feet of the reapers, and I am assured that three crops of corn are not unusual from the fattest of the land. Modern Ashdod stands upon a slight eminence from which the rich plains and valley slopes present a beautiful appearance; but it is a miserable village, without any signs of thrift. We encamped for the night outside of the town in a grove of olive trees, surrounded by a hedge of prickly pear. On the west, the sand hills had encroached greatly upon the cultivated land, but eastward lay one of the richest vales of Palestine. Shepherds passed by our encampment with numerous flocks in quest of pasture. We remember that hither the ark of the Lord was first brought when it was captured from Israel, and that here in his chief seat, Dagon fell and was broken into fragments in its mysterious presence. Here in later times Sargon (Isaiah 20: 1) and Psammeticus had waged bloody wars—the city sustaining against the Egyptians a siege of 29 years, till only a "a remnant of Ashdod" remained. But its "palaces" are gone, and the temple of Dagon is no more; "the pride of the Philistines is cut off."

◆

Character.—In society, character is the first, second, and ultimate quality. A man is never ruined who has not lost his character; while he who has lost his character, whatever be his position, is ruined, to all moral and useful purposes. Envy and calumny will follow a man's success like his shadow; but they will be powerless if he is true to himself, and relies on his native energies to beat or to live them down. Virtues may be misrepresented, but they are virtues still; and in vain will an industrious man be called an idler; a sensible man a fool; a prudent man a spendthrift; a persevering man a changling; or an honest man a knave. The qualities are inherent, and cannot be removed by words, except with a man's own consent. At the same time all calumniators, thrice detected, ought to be banished as criminals, unworthy of the benefits of the society, of which, however powerless, they endeavor to be the pest and bane.

LINES

SUGGESTED BY READING ABOUT THE PALESTINE MISSION.

Go ye forth to the chosen land,
Resting in the Almighty's will,
Sustained by him who can alone
Securely keep from every ill.

Go forth in love, a valiant band,
With heaven-inspired ardor true;
Unseal the haughty Moslem's ear,
Bring home at length the wandering Jew.

In beauty clothe those barren vales,
Though wrapt in desolation long;
Blend with the notes of prayer and praise,
The ever grateful ploughman's song.

Bid there the gospel sun arise,
The night of gloom and error flee;
The sick with healing waters cure,
And cause again the blind to see.

Tell the forsaken of a Friend
In whom 'tis lasting bliss to trust;
Bring back the prodigal to God;
Quench the weary pilgrim's thirst.

Then will the happy time, foretold,
Of promised love and mercy, come;
The once delightful of the Lord
Again in Eden beauty bloom.

Then too will Judah's sacred harp,
So long in mournful silence still,
Awake to heavenly melodies,
On ancient Zion's holy hill.

MATCHES.

"Blacking! blacking! matches!" cried a dirt-begrimmed boy, popping his head in as he opened the door of the reading-room of the Universe Hotel. A chorus of voices in wonderful unison exclaimed, "No, we don't want any." And Mr. Jerome Green, an easy, good natured gentleman, in town for the holidays, who was resting in an arm-chair, making use, however, of only its two hinder legs, sung out with the rest: "No, I don't want any." The little fellow, who had an intelligent but melancholy face, was just going to withdraw himself from the gorgeously decorated room, when Mr. Green, happening to turn his face to the door, caught sight of a muddy little foot, quite blue with the pinching cold—that is to say, that part of it which was not black with incrustations—and recollecting that he had actually been annoyed during the past week by the want of a match in his bedroom, cried: "Halloo! I do want some matches, though, little shaver; how do you sell them?"

"Eighteen-pence a dozen," was the ready reply; "and they don't smell."

"Don't they?" said Mr. Green, and thought to himself, "that is more than I can say of you, my young friend;" but he kept the thought to himself.

All this time Mr. Green had held the bundle of boxes pensively in his hand, as if he thought to get at their intrinsic value by weighing them. "Eighteen-pence a dozen, and they don't smell," repeated the boy, blowing his chilled hands. Still Mr. Green did not speak, for his mind was far away in some hypothetical match-factory, calculating the imaginary wages somebody must get for making matches to sell at eighteen-pence a dozen, and not smell.

"Warranted to keep and burn freely," broke in the boy, who put his best foot forward, beginning to think his chance of a sale growing slim.

"But I do not want a dozen," our gentleman said, rousing himself; "I am sure half the quantity is enough to set me on fire a dozen times. Give me a couple of boxes—here is sixpence for you;" and tendering the boy a shilling, asked him for the change.

The boy's countenance, which had begun to brighten, fell again; he had no change, he had not sold anything that morning.

"Never mind," said easy Mr. Green; "you can bring it me to-morrow; you will find me here at about this hour. What is your name?"

The boy told him, Peter, departing joyfully with professions of promptitude; and Mr. Green got up to saunter away, when his friend Smart, who had been a silent spectator of the scene, left off contemplating his boot-tips, and called after him: "I say, Jerry, what made you give that boy a shilling for two boxes? They are dear enough at sixpence."

"I gave him only sixpence," replied our easy friend; "he is to bring the change to-morrow."

"Surely you do not expect to see that boy again?"

"I positively do," was the quiet reply.

"I bet you a hat you don't."

"Done!" and "done!" followed in quick succession; and the friends parted.

We were standing that afternoon at the corner of 10th street, staring across impassable Broadway, with a number of individuals, whose breasts were filled with the same wishes which agitated our own. We all wanted to cross Broadway, and accumulate as little mud and break as few ribs as possible. On the other side of the street stood our counterparts, lifting their umbrellas, above their heads, and presenting a true picture of life; they would have given anything to stand where we stood, and we as eagerly desired to be where they were. All in vain. Kipp and Brown, Broadway and 49th street, Tompkins Square and Union Square—all rolled by like the roaring and relentless waves of the sea. But there is a sudden lull, and everybody looks at his or her neighbor, as if to say, "Now then!" Everybody does it; everybody gets across. Did we say everybody got safely across? We are safely ashore on the side-walk, and look round. No; everybody has not got across safely. Looking only at the big ships, the omnibuses, a poor little match boy has neglected to dodge the schooners and sloops of this perilous element, and has been run over by a butcher's cart, and his modest wares scattered all over the street. The driver swears awfully, and goes on; a crowd assembles; a compassionate working-man lifts the poor boy up, and carries him to the next drug store. (We, with some other gentlemen, would have been glad to do it, but could not on account of our clothes.) The door closes; the crowd flattens its noses against the window; we cannot get in to help; we have not the time to wait, for the printer's devil is after us; so we wend our way down town, thinking, poor little fellow!

The following morning found Mr. Green in the same place and position we have described in the beginning; and being intently engaged upon the Tribune, he did not observe a very small boy, a very speck of a boy, eyeing him wistfully, evidently trying to attract his attention; but in vain, for he was so small. At last, the miniature edition of humanity made such a discordant noise with the creaking door, that somebody ordered him, in a stern voice, "to clear out," when Mr. Green, thinking vaguely he had seen him before, beckoned to the child; for a child it was, such as ought to have been in a nursery, under the guardian care of a mother. What need to describe him? Was it not the reduced effigy of our friend Peter? The same blue toes, the same blue hands, and the same intelligent, honest eyes. But alas! such woe looking out of a thin little face, on which tears had made channels in the incrustations. Mr. Green was making up his mind, to save further trouble, that the apparition before him must be the same Peter from whom he had bought the matches the day previous, who had shrunk and dwindled over night—possibly from cold, probably from hunger—and who had now come back to bring the change. But this idea struck him as too absurb; for how could such a Tom Thumb sell anything, and where was his basket? While these reflections passed vaguely across the mirror of Mr. Green's mind, Peter junior had been diving diligently into the recesses of his garments, and finally, after sundry attempts, brought out of the side of his jacket, which was on a level with his calf, three distinct copper coins, which he tendered to Mr. Green. "Is you the gemman what Peter owes sixpence to?"

"Yes, my lad; I am the man," was the reply.

"Peter hasn't got sixpence—Peter's gone, and was rund over by a buss—and lost his basket, and his cap—and broke his leg, and broke his arm; and Peter—is—so-o-o o—ill" (here the child broke out into an uncontrollable fit of crying;) and "three—cents is all—he's got."

"Where do you live?" exclaimed Mr. Green, jumping up.

"Little Rum Street, Mud Alley," sobbed the child.

"Come along, then?" and not waiting to hear Mr. Smart's sneer of "a very likely story, my verdant friend," he was out of the room, had called a carriage, and was on his charitable mission with little Joe by the time Mr. Smart had finished his sentence.

The carriage stopped before one of those archways abounding in that part of our city, and always denoting filth, drunkenness, and abject poverty. The child led the way up the alley, ascended a few broken steps, entered a doorless hall, passed through it to the yard, and descending into what appeared to be only a hole, but which had, on nearer inspection, some steps, opened the door of a low dark cellar. When Mr. Green's eyes had become accustomed to the darkness, which a tallow candle, stuck in a bottle, just made visible, he saw in a corner, stretched upon a straw mattrass, his little acquaintance of yesterday; but oh! how changed; the pinched face nearly livid, with here and there a bit of a lock of matted hair glued to it by the cold perspiration; the little body, with its bandaged limbs, motionless, and a low groan now and then all the evidence of life. The furniture of this abode of human beings consisted of a broken table and a three-legged stool. Upon the latter sat a poor woman rocking herself to an fro with the peculiar motion of grief. She was a neighbor, she said, poor enough herself, the Lord knew. The parents of the children had come out a year ago from the old country, poor decent people, with three little ones, and fine children they were; the mother never got over the ship-fever contracted on the passage, and soon left them for a better place, taking the baby with her, which was a mercy; and after the father, a hard-working, steady man, had been killed by a fall from a building, a neighbor proposed to take Peter, sending Joe to Randall's Island. But Peter refused to leave little Joe, and scraping together a small sum by the sale of their few effects, had bought his humble wares, and manfully, with a big heart in his little body, through cold and heat, through hunger and thirst, pursued his calling, making just enough, with what help the poor neighbors could give, to keep body and soul together. He was a fine lad indeed, a good lad, with sense above his years; and now it was all over. The doctor—good, kind gentleman, he had stayed with him and sent medicine—said he could not be moved to the hospital, where they ought to have taken him at first; and, indeed, there was no use in moving him, for he was sinking fast since morning. Green had listened in silent horror to so much misery quietly told, and whether it was from the damp cold or the foul stifling atmosphere, he felt too sick at heart to speak. Just then the boy opened his sunken eyes, and our friend bending over him, a flicker of recognition passed over his face. "I had—not—got—the—money; I—lost—it—all," he muttered painfully, pushing out each word with an effort.

"Never mind the money, my poor boy," struggled out Green, something hard and dry in his throat choking him. "You must get better. I will take care of you and of little Joe, and you shall be cold, and hungry, and naked no more; and you shall get better, if care can do it." Alas! little Peter was beyond the neglect of the hardened and the care of the kind of tihis world. A smile stole softly over his features—he seemed to comprehend. "Thank you—little Joe—thank you—I—had—not—got—the"—. The smile faded, the eyes looked fixed and glassy; one deep sigh, followed by an unmistaken rigidness of features, told that the child's troubles were over. Green fairly burst into tears. He closed the eyes, and stood long and thoughtfully over the body, then leaving money and directions, he took little Joe's hand and left the place.

"What about the hat?" cried Jim Smart, meeting our friend a few days afterwards at the Universe. "Guess you may give me an order on Genin; suppose you won't see your match-boy and your sixpence any more."

"No," replied Green, gravely; "I shall not see the boy any more—he lies under the snow in Greenwood. His body was wretched, miserable, and neglected enough here below; but," he added with emphasis, "his little soul is now incense before God. Good-morning, Mr. Smart; I am leaving town."

MEN FOR THE MINISTRY.

The efficiency of the living ministry, when possessed of the proper qualifications, among the agencies ordained for the world's conversion, is thus eloquently touched upon in a speech by Rev. J. B. Brown, on a recent occasion in Exeter Hall. The meeting was held to promote the effort of the London Missionary Society for sending ten new missionaries to China.

"The resolution I hold in my hand speaks about ten men. My lord, I can not but cling to this word 'men.' The book, as you have heard, is a precious book; it can reach where men do not, and do a work where men sometimes can not come. But, after all, the aspect of a human countenance, and the speech of a human voice, are the mightiest and most excellent instruments; and I think it is no derogation to the honor due to the British and Foreign Bible Society, in the noble and glorious effort they have inaugurated, to say, that I believe the question of the men stands first. Ten men among three hundred millions of Chinese! That is how it stands, here in this resolution. 'Well, it is but a small matter,' you will say, 'ten men among three hundred millions!' My lord, Heaven does not reckon by our measures. In the church of Antioch, in ancient times, the Holy Ghost said, 'Separate me two men for the work of the ministry.' Those two men, Barnabas and Paul, went forth, and through them the whole Roman world was won to Christ. I say, give us men of that faith and mould; men of cultivated and disciplined minds, yet full of pity for the lost; men with fiery energy in them, yet gentle, patient, and loving as children; men of large-hearted and catholic charity; men patient, noble, generous; above all, men whom the love of Christ constraineth; men who are able to preach Christ's gospel with the words winged by their convictions and backed by their hearts, and who are ready at any moment to seal the truth which they are testifying with the best life's blood beating in their hearts. I say, give us ten such men as Barnabas and Paul, and the Chinese empire is already converted to Christ."

WHAT PAUL DID NOT GLORY IN.

There are many things that Paul might have gloried in, if he had thought as some do in this day. If ever there was one on earth who had something to boast of in himself, that man was the great apostle of the Gentiles. Now, if he did not dare to glory, who shall?

He never gloried in his national privileges. He was a Jew by birth, and as he tells us himself, "An Hebrew of the Hebrews." He might have said, like many of his brethren, "I have Abraham for my forefather. I am not a dark, unenlightened heathen. I am one of the favored people of God. I have been admitted into covenant with God by circumcision. I am a far better man than the ignorant Gentiles." But he never said so. He never gloried in anything of this kind. Never for one moment!

He never gloried in his own works. None ever worked so hard for God as he did. He was more abundant in labor than any of the apostles. No living man ever preached so much, traveled so much, and endured so many hardships for Christ's cause. None ever converted so many souls, did so much good to the world, and made himself so useful to mankind. No father of the early church, no reformer, no missionary, no minister, no layman—no one man could ever be named, who did so many good works as the Apostle Paul. But did he ever glory in them, as if they were in the least meritorious, and could save his soul? Never, never for one moment!

He never gloried in his knowledge. He was a man of great gifts naturally, and after he was converted, the Holy Spirit gave him greater gifts still. He was a mighty preacher, and a mighty speaker, and a mighty writer. He was as great with his pen as he was with his tongue. He could reason equally well with the Jews and Gentiles. He could argue with infidels at Corinth, or Pharisees at Jerusalem, or self-righteous people in Galatia. He knew many deep things. He had been in the third heaven, and heard unspeakable words. He had received the spirit of prophecy, and could foretell things yet to come. But did he ever glory in his knowledge, as if it could justify him before God! Never! never! never for one moment!

He never gloried in his graces. If ever there was one who abounded in graces, that man was Paul. He was full of love. How tenderly and affectionately he used to write? He could feel for souls like a mother or a nurse feeling for her child. He was a bold man. He cared not whom he opposed when truth was at stake. He cared not what risks he ran when souls were to be won. He was a self-denying man—in hunger and thirst often, in cold and nakedness, in watchings and fastings. He was a humble man. He thought himself less than the least of all saints, and the chief of sinners. He was a prayerful man. See how it comes out at the beginning of all his Epistles. He was a thankful man. His thanksgivings and his prayers walked side by side. But he never gloried in all this, never valued himself on it, never rested his soul's hopes on it. Oh no, never for a moment!

He never gloried in his churchmanship. If ever there was a good churchman, that man was Paul. He was himself a chosen apostle. He was a founder of churches, and an ordainer of ministers. Timothy and Titus, and many elders, received their first commission from his hands. He was the beginner of services and sacraments in many a dark place. Many a one did he baptize. Many a one did he receive to the Lord's table. Many a meeting for prayer, and praise, and preaching, did he begin and carry on. He was the setter up of discipline in many a young church. Whatever ordinances, and rules, and ceremonies were observed in them, were first recommended by him. But did he ever glory in his office and church standing? Does he ever speak as if his churchmanship would save him, justify him, put away his sins, and make him acceptable before God? Oh no, never, never for a moment!

And now, reader, mark what I say. If the Apostle Paul never gloried in any of these things, who in all the world, from one end to the other, has any right to glory in them in our day? If Paul said, "God forbid that I should glory in any thing whatever, except the cross," who shall dare to say, "I have something to glory of—I am a better man than Paul?" [Dr. Ryle.

SHALL WE HAVE A REVIVAL?

Most assuredly we shall, if we desire it. If we truly want a revival, we shall ask for it, and asking we shall receive. If only two of us can agree to seek this great blessing, it will surely come. For we have the solemn declaration of the Saviour himself, that if any two of us agree on earth as touching any thing that we shall ask the Father in his name, he will do it for us. But do we really desire a revival? Are we honest in God's sight in professing such a desire? Alas! I fear not. Let us search our hearts and see. When we desire any temporal blessing, we do not fold our arms and sit down to wait till it come. We go to work and use the means by which it is to be secured. If we would have a crop, we break up the fallow ground, we carefully prepare the soil, and cast in the precious seed, and then we wait in full expectation till the harvest come. Just so in spiritual things. The fallow ground must be broken, the soil must be prepared, the seed must be sown and cultivated, before the harvest will come. If, then, we expect, or desire a revival, we are diligently preparing for it, we are getting our own hearts right, girding ovrselves for the work before us. But again: A revival, like the natural harvest, is always a busy season. There is much extra work to be done at such times, extra meetings must be held, the inquiring must be instructed, the careless must be warned and exhorted, the luke-warm and the backsliding must be reclaimed. Are you ready to take your part in this work? Suppose the revival should commence to day, would you cheerfully drop all and labor night and day to prompte it? When the harvest is fully ripe, every wise man will drop every thing else till the precious fruits of the earth are secured. How much more will every faithful laborer in the vineyard of Christ, in a time of revival, drop every thing that may hinder him in the all-important work to which he is called! A genuine and true revival implies the hearty cooperation of all the members. Now be honest, scrutinize your heart closely, and see whether you are ready for a revival. Are you ready to begin the work? Is your mind in a proper frame for the work of a revival? Could you enter heartily and cheerfully upon the work of guiding souls to the Saviour?

But again. If a revival comes, it will greatly elevate the standard of piety in the church. It will bring us into much closer union with God. His presence will be felt. It will be something as it was with Moses when he dwelt with God in the Mount. God will be very near to us, and his presence will be sensibly felt. Sin will then appear an awfully odious and dreadful thing. We must depart from all iniquity—even secret sins will then appear terrible, for we shall perceive that they are all set in the light of God's countenance. Are we then prepared to renounce all sin? To live and act as in the immediate presence of God? Otherwise we are not ready for a revival—we do not indeed desire it.

Again. A true revival will make demands upon our purse. It implies a full and hearty consecration of our all to Christ—not the smallest part of the price can be kept back. A church revived is always an active, liberal church. A revival spirit is the spirit of Christ acted out in the life. It begets in us the mind that was in Christ Jesus. Hence a revival will prompt us to deeds of charity and benevolence. It was this that led the primitive disciples to feel that naught of things they possessed were their own—that led many even to part with estates, that they did not especially need, and to devote the proceeds to the benefit of others—yea, that constrained them to take their lives in their hands, and to go far hence into heathen lands, that they might distribute the unsearchable riches that they had found in Christ. If we are to have a revival, we must also have the fruits, the legitimate fruits of a revival. A faith without works is a dead faith—in other words, it is no faith at all—so a revival that does not open the heart and the hand, is no revival, it is only an excitement, the tendency of which is to harden and deaden, and not to quicken and purify the heart. Are you willing then that your heart shall be opened? Would you rejoice to see the standard of benevolence indefinitely elevated in the church to which you belong? If not, then you do not truly desire a revival, for this would be an inevitable result. If you do desire it, then you will not wait till others are revived and take the lead, but you will begin at once to bring in the tithes and offerings and move the Lord therewith, and then wait till the blessing is poured out and ye have not room to receive it.

X.

Plain Talk.—Rev. Nathaniel Howe, of Hopkinton, Mass., was famous for talking with great directness of speech. In one of his published discourses is the following passage, which was addressed to his people:—"Your habits are so firmly fixed, that no reformation is to be expected during my ministry; and, indeed, it would require more power in the Deity to effect it, than it did to create the world; for when he created the world, he had only to say, "Let there be light, and there was light." He had no opposition. But to bring you to a sense of justice and equity, he must overcome your private, personal attachment to your supposed worldly interest, and that would require more power than it did to create the world!"

SABBATH-BREAKING PARTNERSHIPS.

We said that, "if the Sabbath-keeper can deliberately say to his partner, 'I agree that you shall work for me on the Sabbath,' he either flatly contradicts his religious profession, and says that to work on the Sabbath is no sin, or else deliberately makes up his mind to commit sin." Now we cannot believe, that any of our brethren are prepared for the latter alternative. For who wants to commit sin for the sake of sinning? A man may wish to do an act which is in itself sinful, but he wishes to do so, not for the sake of sinning against God, but because of some gratification it will bring to himself; because it will increase his wealth—because it will build up his pride—because it will gratify his ambition—because it will promote his ease—because it will delight his animal appetites. And, for the sake of these gratifications, he wants to see that the act is not sinful. He listens readily to any form of argument which explains away the sinfulness of it; thinks it very plausible, nay, quite conclusive; and finally makes up his mind to conquer his misgivings, and do the thing.

When our brethren enter into Sabbath-breaking partnerships, the leading object is to make money. They do not mean to sin against God; it is not for the sake of doing what God has forbidden, that they form such relations; but money, money—that all-potent charmer—is the thing which fills the mind's eye, and runs away with the heart. Yet, as they cannot engage heartily in any money-making scheme about which conscience keeps up a continual clamor, one of their first objects is to prove that the thing is right; or, rather, that it is not wrong; for they are usually satisfied, if they can merely silence reproof. It takes but little to satisfy them, the love of money having already prepared the mind to be imposed upon by the most specious arguments.

They do not mean to sin against God; but do they mean to glorify him? Is this the motive, from which they enter into such partnerships? We believe we are safe in saying, that it is not. They often talk, it is true, about the great good which the profits of such partnerships will enable them to do. But this, we believe, is an after-thought—something put in, after the deed is done, by way of apology for it. It is not the primary object. But what is the value of this apology, at any rate? It proceeds upon the idea that money is the great instrumentality by which good is done in the world. But it must never be forgotten, that our power to do good is just in proportion to the moral influence we can bring to bear upon our fellow creatures. It is by employing that kind of moral influence which tends to make men better—holier—more like Jesus Christ—that we do them substantial good; and money is of use just so far as, and no farther than, it helps us to bring this moral influence to bear upon them.

Seventh-day Baptists believe, that the Sabbath is a blessing to the human race. In accordance with this belief, they have undertaken to spread the knowledge of it, and to persuade men to keep it. What is wanted, infinitely more than money, to make their mission successful, is the moral influence of their own example. Thou that sayest a man should not break the Sabbath, dost thou break it? Thou that sayest his man-servant, or his maid-servant, should not break it, dost thou hire thy servant to break it? But Seventh-day Baptists entering into copartnerships which involve the violation of the Sabbath on the part of one or more of the firm, servants, clerks or agents, do by that very act employ others to break the Sabbath for them; and in so doing their moral influence is against the institution. So far as the Sabbath is concerned, therefore, their power to do good is gone, because they have no moral influence to exert in its favor.

Now we take it for granted that, when our brethren talk of doing good, they have some reference to the promotion of the Sabbath cause, as well as to other things. We presume, that they do not suppose themselves called to sacrifice the Sabbath, and even to throw their influence against it, for the sake of other commanded duties. Indeed, we know our brethren to be not at all deficient in sectarianism; they want to see something of the Sabbath in almost every work of benevolence that they undertake. But they do most egregiously deceive themselves, if they suppose that their money will promote the knowledge and observance of the institution, without the accompanying influence of their own example.

But if their own example is not all that it should be, in order to the greatest amount of good, perhaps they mean by their money to enlist the labors of those, the moral influence of whose example will be of the most unquestionable kind. But what right has any man to throw away his own moral influence for the sake of increasing that of another? If he should hire a hundred others, and pay them well, to go out and advocate the cause of the Sabbath, he would still be responsible for the kind of influence he was daily exerting himself. He is useful, he answers the end of his existence, he most perfectly discharges his duty to God and man, when he so lives that his example is felt by all who know him to be on the side of truth and virtue. Giving his money to help others is not his duty, when in so doing he would be obliged to compromise his integrity.

Our Saviour was poor—worse off than the foxes and the birds of the air; for those had holes, and these had nests. But he had not where to lay his head. Could he have done more good, if he had been rich in the things of this world? It would be well for those who are always talking about money enabling them to do so much good, to consider what his example teaches. A pure example—a spotless life—was all he had to consecrate to the work he was engaged in. Silver and gold had he none. Yet none that ever appeared in human form, has effected the amount of good that he did. And, as if to show the little value that God sets upon money for the promotion of his cause, the Apostles were all chosen from humble life; the primitive Christians were, for the most part, from the vale of poverty; and, in every age of this world, God has chosen the poor of this world; and, rendering them mighty by the inworking of his Holy Spirit, he has made them the agents of the most important revolutions ever accomplished, with but very little aid, comparatively, from the silver and gold of those who were rich.

The truth is, no man can accomplish any good in this world of sin without God's blessing. The opposing influences are every where too mighty to be overcome, unless God shall work with him, and give him the victory. He may reasonably expect God's blessing upon his labors, just so far as, and no farther than, they are directed in strict conformity to his word. The poor woman who cast her two mites into the treasury, was said to have cast in more than all the rich. We suppose that she cast in more, not merely in proportion to her ability, but because God, willing always to show his regard for the motives of the heart, connected his blessing with these two mites, and made them the means of accomplishing actually more than was accomplished by all the abundance of those who were less pure. In accordance with this view, we are firm in the persuasion, that a very small sum devoted by a few consistent—rigidly consistent—Sabbath-keepers, would do more for the advancement of the cause, than the thousands we are able to contribute as the result of the business of Sabbath-breaking partnerships. EDUCATION.

What is Education? This is the primal question suggested by our theme. It is, indeed, a common, familiar question—easy enough in asking, withal, but, like most other questions, more easily asked than answered. Manifold are the answers proposed. These receive their peculiar form and hue from the view taken of the powers and relations of the being to be educated. Every person looks at the subject through a glass colored more or less by his individualities, aims and pursuits.

The utilitarian, for instance, will tell you, that the prime object of all education is, to do—to gain power to perform. The linguist will seek for the meaning in the derivation of the term. Finding its etymology to be e, out—duca, to lead, or draw—and ion, the act of; ergo, education is the drawing or leading out of the mind—with various other derived meanings. The seeker, the discoverer, defines education to be the drawing in, gathering, filling up the mind, with various other derived definitions, of course. One will define it as physical culture—another intellectual culture—another lays chief stress upon the development of the heart—another, upon the development of the religious affections—still another concludes that it is simple health—health of the whole man. The philosopher of the Aristotolian school, believing that mind is a mere passivity, like unto a sheet of white paper ready to be written upon by outward circumstances, places great stress on the outward circumstances—the writers that are writing their uneffacable characters upon the mind. The Platonic philosopher, verging, perhaps, to the other extreme, with his innate ideas, like dormant bees ready to awake to activity in the genial rays of the sun—like crouchant lions, ready to spring upon their prey whenever presented—or, like woodland songsters, prepared to warble forth their matin notes on the first appearance of the morning sun.

With these various and in a measure conflicting definitions before us, we are led to inquire, with renewed interest, What is Education? A correct definition must be based upon the nature and relations of the substance to be educated—upon these must depend its truthfulness and significancy.

Mind is a self-conscious, self-determining, self-developing substance; yet depending upon conditions or assistants in its process of development and activity. This spiritual substance is connected with the world by a physical organism—a medium between the world without and the mind within. Man, thus constituted, is a being of thought, of action, of susceptibilities, developing by inherent powers. Hence, in so far as all definitions represent mind as a mere passivity, to be drawn out—as a mere blank, to be written upon—a mere reservoir, to receive and retain knowledge—a thing of mere health and disease—they are wrong or imperfect—one-sided.

A complete definition would doubtless include several ideas—among which might be reckoned as primary—

1. Health. This health is opposed to disease or deformity—opposed to everything that does not imply a normal state, growth, and activity of our whole being. There is disease both of body and spirit. There is physical dyspepsia, intellectual dyspepsia, and moral dyspepsia. There is palsy physical, and palsy spiritual—leprous bodies, and leprous souls—physical blindness and deafness, and spiritual blindness and deafness—deformity of bone and muscle, also deformity of heart and will. It is also opposed to all stereotyped, Procrustean methods of educating all, as if they were created precisely alike—all cast in the same mold—all designed to travel the same road—fill the same stations—perform the same routine of duties. It is one of the great objects of education to prevent disease and deformity, and develop a being hale, proportional—prepared to fulfill his special mission. That individual best answers to this, who presents a healthy soul in a healthy body.

2. Growth. Mere health is consistent, independent of growth, development, advancement; but a true education gives growth as well as health. This capability of development increases as we ascend to the higher departments of our nature. This growth must not be like the growth of the rock, increasing by outward accretions—nor like indigenous plants, growing from without, inward—but like the exogenous plants, growing from within, outward.

3. Habitudes. Habitudes are the powers resulting from education. They are the laws enacted by practice. They are the dexterity, precision, facility, strength, scope, and grace, furnished by custom. Man is a being of habit. It has been truly said, that man is a "bundle of habits." This bundle is made up and bound together in the process of education. As is our education, so are our habits. As are our habits, so is our character. Habits are the embodiments, the exponents of character. Habit links the present with the past and future—making us slaves to the customs of our former life—making, also, our present acts the tyrannical lawgivers to the future. It throws around our lives a cordon line, past which it is next to fruitless to attempt a passage. It is the cage, with strong hasp and lock, against which we may beat and struggle, with but faint hope of escape. That is truly education, which subjects all the powers of our being to systematic habits, that are in harmony with the useful, the true, the beautiful, and the good—which takes our wandering impulses and reduces them to habitual order and energy—develops our sympathies into habitual benevolence—our thoughts into well-springs of truth flowing on, ever fuller and purer—which makes a man, in the language of another, just, and generous, and good, without knowing that he is practicing any virtue, or overcoming any difficulty, who, at the close of a long life, has so changed his original nature, that he feels it an effort to do wrong, and a mere compliance with habit, to perform every great and sacred duty of life—which awakens habitual longings and strivings after purity and perfection, and makes us, through the grace of God, fit candidates for eternal happiness and glory.

"RESTRICTED COMMUNION."

I know of no other communion, in the church or in the Bible, but a restricted one. All the branches of the professed Christian church, that celebrate the "Lord's Supper," (so far as I know,) restrict it to certain classes of religionists, while they reject all others. The essential difference among them is, that some restrict it closer than others. I have a long time felt, that it was probable that few, if any, were close enough in their restrictions. I have therefore been in the habit of restricting it to myself alone, embracing no other member of the church to which I belong. Short of this I believe that I can not conform to the instruction of Jesus Christ when he gave the institution, or the teaching of an Apostle when writing concerning the Lord's Supper. The language of Jesus Christ is, "This do in remembrance of me." (Luke xxii. 19.) The language of the Apostle (1 Cor. xi. 25, 26,) is, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood; this do ye, as oft as ye drink IT, in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come."

I have a long time been at a loss to know why baptism should be restricted and the communion not restricted. J. B.

COMMUNION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Having a high opinion of the judgment of your correspondent S. S. Griswold, and observing that he, and other much-esteemed brethren in the Seventh-day Baptist churches, hold—and some of them to some extent practice—on the open communion plan, I am induced to suggest whether, in view of the many and great privations we have to bear in consequence of attempting to maintain separate church organizations from the first-day-keeping community among which we live, it would not be best for our churches to disband, and their members connect themselves with those churches or societies where it may chance to be most convenient and agreeable for them to associate and labor for the promotion of the cause of the Redeemer and the truth of God.

I should be glad if you, or your correspondent, S. S. Griswold, would give the readers of the Sabbath Recorder an opinion on the subject above suggested, as it would afford incalculable relief to many of them, if such a course should be found to be advisable.

AFRICAN COTTON.

The connection between Cotton and Slavery is well established and very intimate. With many persons, the first objection to the abolition of slavery is the supposed increase in the price of cotton cloth which would result from it. What if Africa, by furnishing an abundant supply of cotton, should remove this objection, and pave the way toemancipation! Such a thing is among the possibilities—perhaps among the probabilities. In relation to the matter, Dr. Irving, a missionary to Africa, has written to Dr. Shaw the annexed remarks. The letter is published in the proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society:—

"In December, 1852, I was ordered on service to Abbeocuta, with Commander Foote, then senior officer. There I was much struck with the superior appearance of the people and their great capabilities, the productiveness of the soil, the variety of objects which might lead to an extensive and lucrative commerce with England, more especially that of cotton, which is indigenous, and carefully cultivated by the Yarubas. These comprise a population of nearly three million souls, clothed entirely in cloths manufactured by themselves. On my return to England, I represented these things to the Church Missionary Society, and many of the samples of African productions I brought home excited great attention among manufacturers and others. The cotton proved to be of the very quality required for the purposes of manufacture. Among them was also an entirely new kind of silk, respecting which several eminent merchants in London are very anxious for further information. I volunteered to go out and examine the country between the Niger, Bight of Benia and Lander's route, between Badagry and Boussa, a country, excepting at one or two points where our missionaries had been the pioneers, never yet visited by white men. My offer has been accepted, and I start as agent in Yaruba with the sanction of Sir James Graham and Lord Clarendon. The necessary instruments for making observations have been forwarded to me."

PRAYER FOR MINISTERS.

I noticed in the Recorder of March 9th, an article headed, "Prayer for Ministers." Now, while I would not say one word against prayer for ministers, but rather commend it, I wish to ask our ministering brethren, if it is not equally important for them to pray for themselves, as it is for their brethren to pray for them. The Bible says, If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God. James 1:5. The minister needs wisdom, that he may go in and out before the people in such a manner that they shall have no evil thing to say. He needs wisdom to enable him to select subjects, so that they will be adapted to the wants of the people. He needs wisdom, that he may be able rightly to divide the word. This, then, it is the duty of the minister, or any other one, to ask for himself.

It is said that great things are expected of the minister. Very true; he has a great God, to whom he must go in prayer, (for God is able with worms to thresh mountains,) and God will give him strength to perform great things.

It is said that the minister is encompassed with infirmities. That is even so; and when I begin to consider his infirmities, I think they need the whole Christian church to pray for them. But how ineffectual will be the prayer of the whole church, if the minister does not pray earnestly. God would have prayer offered directly to himself; therefore it is the minister's duty to pray for himself, as no other one (but Christ) can feel his infirmities. When he takes his seat to prepare his subject, he needs to have his heart raised to God in prayer, that he would give him wisdom to arrange it skillfully, that it may be adapted to the wants of the congregation. He needs to pray that he may have his soul warmed with the love of God when he appears before his congregation—that he may come in all the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. Consider the malice of Satan against ministers; he is ever busy, striving to render the labor of the minister unavailing. The minister should pray that the Holy Spirit may be present to press the word to the heart, and write it there as with the point of a diamond, that it may be productive of fruit to the glory of God. C. Rowley.

SUPPLY OF DESTITUTE CHURCHES.

The reading of an article in the Recorder, under the caption of "Supply of Destitute Churches," gave rise to a train of reflections, a part of which I offer for publication.

It appears to me, that the ministry is in a great degree responsible for the deficiency of ministers—from the fact, that too many of them have become so much conformed to the world, that they seem to be destitute of the power of religion. Jesus commanded his disciples to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature, and gave them the assurance, that he would be with them always, even unto the end of the world. But now, it seems, they have forgotten the promises of God, and where they can secure the greatest salary, there duty calls them. Now I think, if a minister has dedicated his services to the Lord, he has no right to bind himself to serve any particular church for any stated time, but should labor where he can do the most good. Let a minister go forth in the strength of the Lord, full of zeal and the Holy Ghost, and his labors will be crowned with success in the conversion of sinners, old saints will be edified and strengthened, and backsliders will be reclaimed, and the Lord of the harvest will open the hearts of his children, that they will impart of their substance to supply his wants. Those who were sent, without money or script, &c., lacked nothing. Under such circumstances, it is no more than reasonable to expect that the churches will arise from the low grounds they are now occupying, and the talents that are now buried be dug up and put "into the bank," and the churches not only be supplied, but numbers might be engaged in the home and foreign fields.

The churches, too, are responsible for the deficiency. It is said that the Lord will withhold no good thing from them that walk uprightly; and again, the fervent, effectual prayer of the righteous availeth much. Hence, if ministers and pastors are good things, the absence of them argues against the spirituality of such churches.

Again, the opinion is prevalent, that the minister should be an example for others to follow. This I believe is as it should be, so far as he follows Christ; but let him engage extensively in worldly matters, and especially in trading and trafficking, and it will have a withering influence over those with whom he may be connected; and while they are reaching out after gain and worldly honors, vital piety wanes, the institutions and ordinances of God's house are neglected, the prayer-meeting and family devotion become irksome, jealousies and unkind feelings creep in, jars and contentions follow, and religion becomes a byword in community.

May the Lord help us all, whether priest or people, to learn our duty, and let us bring our tithes and offerings into the storehouse of the Lord, and see if he will not pour out a blessing for us. H.

SABBATH-KEEPING OF THE CHINESE INSURGENTS.

The readers of the Recorder have watched with deep interest the developments of the religious character of the Chinese revolution, and especially its Sabbath-keeping features. In the last letter of Bro. Carpenter, published in the Recorder of March 2, he says, "They keep the Sabbath regularly (seventh day probably.") In another part of the same letter, in which he seeks advice of the Board, he states, without qualification, "that the patriots keep the seventh day." This is our latest intelligence. While we rejoice in this, we must not forget that they need much more yet, perhaps, to make them such as we can fellowship as Christians. Who knows but God directed our missionaries to China for such a time as this? We do well to look confidently to God, for the restoration of his Sabbath in all the earth. J. B.

The Million Testaments for China.—It may be interesting to our readers (says an English paper) to know what steps are being taken to accomplish this noble undertaking. The work is already in progress. The printing-presses in China are busily employed. Letters have been recently received by the Bible Society from their corresponding committee, and plans are matured for printing 250,000 copies in China in eighteen months, dating from the 1st of January, 1854. The Bishop of Victoria guarantees to furnish from his stations, 85,000; Dr. Medhurst, 115,000; Dr. Legg, 50,000. It is proposed that another quarter of a million should be printed in London in the same period, for which wooden blocks will be sent from China. Thus half a million will be ready in eighteen months, and if similar expedition be employed in the remaining portion of the work, the whole will be completed in three years, a much shorter time than had been anticipated. All English missionaries are working most heartily and lovingly in carrying out this gigantic scheme of Christian liberality. It will no doubt give great satisfaction to the public when they are informed that the committee of the Bible Society at their sitting on Monday passed a resolution for the printing of 50,000 copies of the entire Bible in Chinese at as early a period as practicable. The funds for the New Testaments have been readily supplied, nor can it be doubted that the Bible Society will receive prompt and generous aid to carry out the new feature of their plan for supplying China with a large installment of the Word of God.

Missions to China.—The Secretary of the London Missionary Society acknowledges the receipt of over eight thousand pounds on account of the special fund for China; and congregational collections are still in progress. One of the contributions is of a significant and painful character. It was sent to the editors of the Leeds Mercury, a paper of the very highest character, having an immense circulation in Yorkshire and Lancashire. The contributor writes thus:—

"Gentlemen: I beg to present to the London Missionary Society £30, in aid of the fund for sending out additional ministers to China. This, in all probability, would have been given for the spread of Methodism, had not its unscriptural discipline, like an incubus, deprived it of its efficiency, and sunk it in public estimation. Its claims are altogether incompatible with the civil and religious liberties of mankind; and if a speedy and thorough reform is not effected, the force of circumstances and the irresistible march of events will drive it from the position it even now sustains. Large numbers of excellent men have withdrawn from its communion; others will follow, and where will their successors be found?"

Prohibitory Liquor Law.—In the New York State Senate, on the 9th instant, the Prohibitory Liquor Bill was passed by a vote of 21 to 11. The 1st of December next is the time fixed for it to go into operation.

The more popular branch of the Massachusetts, Legislature on Thursday, March 9th, refused to take any step toward repealing or essentially modifying the Prohibitory Liquor Law of that State, by a vote of more than two to one—by far the largest majority ever given in that House, or by the State, in any way, on the side of Prohibition.

It is now nearly three years since the model act of Prohibition—the glorious Maine Law—was adopted. Since then, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota, have each passed acts contemplating the same end, while New York has chosen a Legislature expressly to follow their beneficent example.

An Illustration of Frankness.—The Independent notices the retirement of Dr. Cox from his pastoral charge in Brooklyn, in consequence of long-continued ill health, and adds:—

"It would be altogether idle and wrong for us to say, that the retirement of Dr. Cox from public labors among us, gives us now the keen sense of personal and public bereavement which we should have felt, had his later course on the great moral questions of our time—especially on that fundamental and all-engrossing question of the maintenance and advancement of Human Rights in this Republic—been what was to have been expected from his ardent and chivalrous nature, and his devotion to the Gospel; had it been what seemed prophesied of him by his early and enkindling anti-slavery commitments. Loving the man as we do, sincerely and admiringly, for his many noble traits, we have always felt with keen regret that he let slip a rare opportunity of achieving the purest and most permanent Christian renown, that he brought a shadow upon his name, and put a chain upon his influence, when he allowed himself to be ranked for Might against Right, on the side of the inhuman and infidel Congressional legislation of four years ago. And having ceased then, forever, to look to him or to the other till then distinguished men associated with him on the side of the oppressor, for any gallant, self-devoted and efficient leadership of public opinion in the North, on the questions that really arrest and agitate the public mind here, we cannot estimate the public loss in his departure so highly as others of our contemporaries may."

News-Boys' Lodging-House.—Charles L. Brace gives notice through the N. Y. Tribune, that an effort is just being made by the Children's Aid Society to raise a large class of boys who have hitherto been mostly out of good influence—the news-boys. The plan is to furnish the boys with good lodging, at sixpence a night; and, in connection with the lodging room, to have a pleasant, warm room, with books, papers, &c., where they can read or be taught, or listen to some simple lecture or lesson. A bath-room and an office for the Superintendent is connected with it. A book and savings box will be kept, by means of which each boy can deposit in the Sixpenny Bank. These boys are the shrewdest and sharpest of the city boys. They are utterly independent, and have lived by their wits since they could walk. If brought under good influences, they would make active, enterprising men. As it is now, they are mostly homeless, living in the worst associations, and spending their money in gambling and theaters as fast as they make it.

Religious Newspapers.—At an early period of our ministry in another State, (says a correspondent of the Watchman and Reflector,) we were greatly surprised to find but five or six families in our whole parish receiving regularly a religious paper. By prompt personal effort, we succeeded in obtaining over forty new subscribers for the State paper, and the incoming of these papers gave a singular and most gratifying impulse to all the religious activities of the parish. A demand was created for religious books; greater sympathy was felt, and larger contributions made for benevolent objects; and a broader and more active intelligence was evident in the devotional meetings of the church, as well as in the general tone of Society. From that time we have cherished a deep conviction of the worth of religious papers, and a personal sympathy with their conductors; and we commend to the pastor, who wishes to surround himself with an intelligent, enterprising, and liberal people, to take efficient measures for securing to every family in his parish the weekly visit of some well-conducted religious journal.

An Example.—The Puritan Recorder remarks, that congregations often greatly underrate their actual ability to provide for the support of their pastors; and permit them to struggle for subsistence upon an insufficient compensation, because they suppose themselves unable to give such an one as they may acknowledge, perhaps, would be just and equal. As an instance, we do not say of all which is embraced in the above statement, but of an ability which had grown greatly to exceed the amount given, we may refer to the case of the Rev. Dr. Hewit's late congregation in Bridgeport, Ct., now divided in order to sustain two ministers instead of one. Dr. Hewit, before the division, received a salary of $800. The portion of the congregation that went out with him now give him a salary of $1000; and the other portion of the Society give their newly-settled minister $1,500, besides having paid for him a debt of $700. So that the same people are now paying for the support of the ministry $2,500, where they gave but $800 before.

Sabbath-Breaking.—The Boston correspondent of the Independent says: 'About every Monday morning and evening paper in the city has an editorial article headed, "Warning to Sabbath-breakers," "Sunday fishers in peril," &c., and giving a description of four boys who came near losing their lives, while on a fishing excursion in our Boston harbor. Their boat was driven before a sudden gale, and came frightfully near going out to sea with them; but it fortunately struck upon a bar, from which they got ashore, well drenched, and started for the city on foot, thirty miles. Query: May editors write editorials, and hire boys and girls to set types, all on the Sabbath, for Monday morning papers, and then issue grave homilies to the naughty boys who fish Sundays? The warnings are good, only it is desirable, for effect, that those who give them should not be notorious Sabbath-breakers.'

Home Mission Salaries.—The average salaries of the missionaries of the New Hampshire Society are $377; of the Massachusetts Society, $437. In Vermont, it is reported that a large number of the missionaries are so poorly supported as to be obliged to spend part of their time in secular pursuits to keep from positive want, and this as a rule. The Missionaries of the Connecticut Society have an average salary of $434. The numerous laborers of the Home Missionary Society at the West receive an average of $400; and if, by reason of pity or other influence, they receive more, their commission is thereby destroyed.

General Intelligence.

Abstract of Proceedings in Congress.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 6.

The SENATE was not in session, having adjourned over.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, after the transaction of some unimportant business, went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Homestead bill. Several amendments were offered and discussed, and the bill finally passed by a vote of 107 to 72. A resolution was then adopted, instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the propriety of directing legal proceedings to recover any sum of money which may have been paid to any person out of the Treasury on the claim of Dr. Gardiner.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 7.

In the SENATE, Mr. Everett of Massachusetts, and Mr. Clayton of Delaware, requested unanimous consent to have their vote recorded in opposition to the passage of the Nebraska bill, having been absent when the final vote was taken on Saturday morning, which was refused, and the request withdrawn. The Homestead bill was received from the House, and, after considerable debate, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

In the HOUSE, this being one of the days set apart for the transaction of territorial business, reports were received from committees in relation thereto. The Senate bill to aid Minnesota to construct a railroad in that Territory for military and other purposes, was then taken up and debated till the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 8.

In the SENATE, a resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, asking for the improvement of certain harbors, was submitted. The bill to promote the efficiency of the army, by establishing a retired list for disabled and inefficient officers, was passed. The bill granting lands to the States for the support of the indigent insane, was passed by a vote of 25 to 12. The consideration of the question relative to the right of Mr. Phelps, Senator from Vermont, to hold his seat, was resumed.

The HOUSE resumed the consideration of the bill granting land to Minnesota for railroad purposes, which was debated until the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 9.

In the SENATE, a large number of remonstrances against the Nebraska bill were presented by Messrs. Sumner, Cass and Seward. The latter gentleman presented one from Brooklyn, one hundred feet in length and signed by 3,000 persons, who give their places of residence. The Committee on Public Lands reported back the Homestead bill as it passed the House, without amendment, and its consideration was postponed and made the special order for Second-day, March 20.

The HOUSE resumed the consideration of the Minnesota Land bill. Mr. Kerr of North Carolina offered an amendment to the bill, which gives the money arising from the sale of the reserved sections to those States which have received no grants of land for internal improvements, according their federal representation in Congress, which led to a long debate, but the amendment was finally carried by a vote of 85 to 84.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 10.

In the SENATE, Mr. Shields endeavored to put upon its final passage the bill providing for a retired list of navy officers, but failed, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of bills upon the private calendar. After debate, many bills were postponed, and ten private bills passed. Adjourned over until Second-day.

In the HOUSE, a resolution was adopted, requesting the President to communicate to Congress whatever information he may have received relative to the seizure and detention of the steamer Black Warrior at Havana and the imprisonment of her officers; also any information he may have in reference to other violations of our rights by the Spanish authorities. Mr. Dean of New York gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to repeal our neutrality laws, so far as they are applicable to Spain. The bill authorizing the construction of a light-house on Cohasset Rocks was passed. The consideration of the bill granting lands to Minnesota for railroads and other purposes, was then resumed, and, after debate, was tabled by a vote of 120 to 66.

The Homestead Bill.

By reference to our abstract of proceedings in Congress, it will be seen that the House has passed the Homestead Bill by a vote of 101 to 78. The bill has yet to pass the ordeal of the Senate, which will doubtless be severe. There is much doubt about its becoming a law. The bill provides:—

First: That any free white person, who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years, and is a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public land, which at the time of the application may be subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands and after the same shall have been surveyed.

Second: The person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office, in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register, that he or she is the head of a family, or twenty-one years of age, and upon making affidavit and filing on the register he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified; provided that no certificate shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry, and if at the expiration of such time the persons making such entry, or if he be dead, his widow, or in case of his death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heir or devisee in case of her death, shall prove by two creditable witnesses that he or she or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated it or any part thereof, then in such he or she or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law; provided further, in case of death of both father or mother, leaving an infant child or children under twenty-one years of age, the right and the fee shall inure to the benefit of the said infant child or children, and the executor, administrator, or guardian may at any time within two years after the death of such surviving parent, and in accordance with the laws of the State in which such children for the time being have their domicil, sell said land for the benefit of the said infants, for no other purpose, and the purchaser shall acquire the absolute title by the purchase and be entitled to a patent from the United States.

Third: All land acquired under this act shall in no event become liable to satisfaction of any debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor.

Fourth: In case a person who has filed the affidavit required shall have changed his or her residence, or abandoned said entry for more than six months at any one time, in that event the land so entered to revert back to Government, subject to an appeal to the General Land Office.

Fifth: If any individual now a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act, shall have filed a declaration of intention, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuance of the patent as made and provided for in this act, shall be placed upon an equal footing with the native-born citizen of the United States.

Sixth: No individual is permitted to make more than one entry under the provisions of this act, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and the Registers and Receivers of the several Land Offices shall be entitled to receive the same compensation for any lands entered under the provisions of this act that they are now entitled to receive when the same quantity of land is entered with money—one half to be paid by the person making the application at the time of so doing, and the other half on the issue of the certificate by the person to whom it may be issued: Provided, however, all persons entering land under the provisions of this act shall, as near as may be practicable in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or interfere in any manner whatever with existing preëmption rights: And provided, further, that the provisions of this act shall be so construed as to authorize the class of persons provided for who may not own over 160 acres of land, to enter free of cost any public lands adjoining his or her farm subject to private entry at the minimum price, in quantity, when added to what he or she now owns, equal to 160 acres, provided he or she shall cultivate the whole or part thereof.

European News.

We have ten days later news from Europe, of which the substance will be found below.

The Moniteur announces that the Czar's letter from St. Petersburg arrived in Paris on the 18th of February, and that the Emperor Nicholas does not accept the proposal for arrangements which was presented to him. The Moniteur adds: "This reply leaves no chance of a pacific solution."

From the seat of war there is nothing novel. The Russians are steadily bringing up their forces against Kalafat, but have not yet opened the seige. Nor has Omer Pasha undertaken any movement upon Gorchakoff's flank or rear. The allied fleets are in the Bosphorus, sending out a few steamers as they may be wanted to convoy Turkish vessels on the Euxine.

England is at length in a state of war. Troops are being embarked at several ports, and on all hands there is apparent the greatest activity in preparations for the approaching struggle. The British contingent of land forces for the aid of Turkey has been fixed at twenty thousand men, in consequence of the refusal of Lord Raglan to assume the command of any inferior force.

Letters from St. Petersburgh state that military preparations are going on in Russia on an immense scale, and with the greatest activity.

The utmost activity prevails in France in preparations for war. In the Foreign Office a number of Orientals are engaged in translating circulars, orders, manifestos, &c., into the Eastern dialects, and interpreters will accompany each battalion. All the French troops will be ready to embark simultaneously with the British forces. The whole French force under orders for Turkey, number eighty thousand, and consist of the flower of the army.

A dreadful colliery explosion occurred in the Arley mine of the Ince Hall Coal Company, near Wigan, Eng., on the 18th of February. About 240 men and boys were in the pit. Soon after 3 o'clock, the persons above ground heard two loud explosions, and immediately a signal was made from below to haul up the miners. Thirty men were immediately hauled up from the south shaft, and reported that the north shaft was on fire in such a manner as to cut off the retreat of the rest of the workmen. It was some hours before the fire could be extinguished so as to allow a body of searchers to descend. On arriving at the north level they found the unfortunate men piled up in heaps and dead. Eighty bodies were at once taken up, and from another part of the shaft twenty-four bodies. Only a few, and those much exhausted, were got out alive. Some few had escaped into another pit, so that the exact number lost is not known, but as forty persons were known to be in a part of the mine where the roof has fallen in, the number of dead cannot be less than one hundred and twenty. In the same mine sixty lives were lost by an explosion in March of last year.

The Lord Chamberlain has notified Mr. Buchanan that he may appear at Court in any costume he likes.

Great numbers of people in Wales are preparing to emigrate this Spring to Salt Lake City, to join the Mormons.

The bark Bona Dea, from Savannah for Liverpool, was picked up on the — ult. off the southwest coast of Ireland, water-logged—the crew having been without food or water for twelve days. Ten of the crew, including the master, had died of starvation. The remaining seven of the crew were landed at Swansea by the bark Cuba, and at last accounts were doing well.

Greek disturbances are reported to be prevailing in southern Albania. Sixty Greeks, it is said, were killed in Arta, and the garrison was besieged.

At Salonica, on the 10th Feb., an insurrection broke out, and the Turks attacked and defeated the insurgents.

Disturbances had broken out in Asia Minor, and conflicts had occurred at Kutaiah, Angura, Scalanovel, &c. The troubles had been suppressed.

Throughout Greece great excitement prevailed, and outbreaks had occurred in the Ionian Islands.

In Asia, the Russians have been again repulsed from before the Fort of Shefketil, with the loss of two thousand men. This is about the only important item of news from that quarter.

Lord Palmerston, in answer to a question, replied that Smith O'Brien, having acted as a gentleman in refusing to escape, at the expense of breaking his parole, is to be pardoned.

California News.

By the steamer North Star, two weeks later news from California was received in New York on the 11th inst.

The most important item of news is the wreck of the fine clipper-ship San Francisco, of this city. The San Francisco was a new vessel, and was on her first voyage out. She was built by Abram C. Bell, in 1853, and registered 1,307 tuns. She had a mixed cargo, valued at $100,000; vessel and freight, $153,000. The ship and freight were fully insured.

The Theater and several other buildings at Placerville were burned on the 30th of January. Total loss about $15,000.

The proceedings of the fillibusters in Lower California have excited a good deal of indignation about San Diego, where the citizens were proposing to get up a company to thrash them, and were to hold a meeting on the 2d.

There have been four or five rainy days during the fortnight, and the gulches and dry diggings continued to be well supplied with water. The news from all portions of the mines is cheering, and there are many reports of rich diggings lately discovered in different mining districts.

At Cherokee Flat, rumor has it that a vein of decomposed quartz was found, about six inches in diameter, which is unbroken, and has proved exceedingly rich. From 200 pounds of dirt 28 pounds of gold were washed. Considerable excitement has been the consequence. High prices, even $50,000, it is said, have been offered for the claim, or a share in it, and refused. The discoverers are French and Italians, who have their guns loaded and keep a guard.

Our news from Oregon is to the 3d. The cold weather experienced here about the 20th of January was severely felt in Oregon. The Columbia River was obstructed by the ice so that for more than a week there was no communication between Astoria and the country above. The Indians say that the weather in Oregon never was so cold before, and that the Americans were to blame for it. Snow had fallen at Portland fourteen inches deep. It is said that coal has been found in Polk County.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Crystal Palace is to be kept open during the coming summer, and will doubtless be an attractive place of resort. With a view to secure more satisfactory pecuniary results, the officers have been almost entirely changed, and P. T. Barnum has been chosen President. The following are the names of the new Directors:—

Thos. B. Stillman,
Wm. O'Brien,
Edward Haight,
John H. Cornell,
Phineas T. Barnum,
Jas. B. Brewster,
J. A. Westervelt,

THE CASE OF DR. GARDINER.—The inquest as to the cause of Dr. Gardiner's death was concluded at Washington, March 10th. Drs. Breed and Steiner, who made a chemical analysis of the contents of the stomach, testified to finding strychnine and brucine, in quantities more than sufficient to destroy life. Pieces of paper were also found in the stomach, which had been used as inclosures for the poison, and prevented its immediate action. The powder found in the pocket of deceased was declared to be strychnine and brucine, and the paper containing it was much worn from being carried long in the pocket. The Jury rendered the following verdict: "From the evidence before us, we are of opinion that he came to his death from strychnine and brucine, voluntarily taken after his conviction and sentence."

SUMMARY.

The Cleveland Homeopathic College Commencement took place week before last, when thirty persons graduated and received the medical degree, among them being three regular graduates of the old school, and two females. At the Commencement of the Philadelphia Homeopathic College, lately, there were a number of persons graduated who previously bore the degree of M. D. from regular colleges of the old school of medicine.

The Hornellsville Tribune has been informed that Mr. Charles Minot, whose resignation of the Superintendency of the New York and Erie Road we noticed a few days since, will visit during the common season, and that the Emperor of Russia has offered him the post of Superintendent of the St. Petersburg and Moscow Railway.

A petition has been presented to our Legislature by Mr. George D. W. Clinton, from Mr. Ed. D. James, who was part owner of the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank of Oswego, asking the Legislature to appoint a Committee to inquire into the proceedings of the Superintendent of the Bank Department in winding up that Bank.

Thomas Motley and Wm. Blackledge, the two men whose barbarous crime was hunting down and flaying alive a slave, which made their case notorious, were hung at Waterloo, South Carolina, on Friday, March 3d.

A dispatch dated Hudson, Friday, March 10, 1854, says: The locomotive Manchester, on the Hudson River Railroad, exploded at this station this evening, killing the engineer and badly injuring the fireman. The engine is a perfect wreck.

The Coroner's Jury in the case of the recent explosion at Hartford, Ct., say that the immediate cause of the explosion was the excessive accumulation of steam, which had been generated owing to the carelessness and inattention of the engineer, by reason whereof the water in the boiler had become reduced, not only below the lowest gauge cock, but to such an extent as to leave a portion of the flues uncovered, and which then became heated to a red heat—and that while the boiler was in that condition, with the usual fire and high pressure of steam, the engineer applied the pumps and commenced injecting water therein, which resulted in partially collapsing one of the flues, and in the explosion which followed within a few minutes thereafter.

The steamer Atlantic, which arrived at New York from Liverpool last week, had rather a hard time in getting into port. At first she got ashore some fifty miles south of Sandy Hook, but got off without damage. While entering the harbor about 10 o'clock on Tuesday evening, she went aground on the False Hook, where she remained until 3 o'clock next morning, when she was got off with the assistance of the steam tug Titan, and anchored near the Hook. At daylight she got under way, and after passing the Quarantine Ground, went aground on the mud flat, about one mile below Red Hook. She was got off at 1½ o'clock in the afternoon without damage, and proceeded to her dock.

On the 16th June next a State Educational Convention will be held in Huntsville, Texas.
